

25c

No. 1

AN ORIGINAL

EC
PICTO-FICTION
MAGAZINE

Adult Tales of

TERROR

Horror and Suspense

ILLUSTRATED

Introducing...

PICTO-FICTION

a new form of ADULT ENTERTAINMENT

On-the-spot photograph of Don Smith (seated) with other creative people of the Fitzgerald Advertising Agency, New Orleans, La.

Picture yourself as an artist

Don Smith's Actual True Story May Show You the Way to a New Life.

Did you like to draw as a child? Do you wonder whether there is a career awaiting you as an artist?

Don't say "No"—until you read the true story of Donald C. Smith, 3 years ago, Don knew nothing about art. He even doubted that he had talent. Today he holds the title of "professional illustrator" at a big advertising agency. And he is a very happy man. He loves his job . . . makes good money . . . works on important accounts . . . meets interesting people. And in this exciting field—where there is no age limit, seniority or prejudice—Don knows that his future is entirely in his own hands.

Most artists enjoy the year-round security of a steady, well-paid job. But some men and women prefer to be their own bosses. Working at home or a studio—they pick and choose their assignments, work anywhere in the country, and demand good prices for their work.

How about you? Are you missing a fascinating, money-making art career simply because you aren't sure that you have talent?

Here's your chance to find out—FREE. Through a remarkable art talent test—developed by America's 12 Most Famous Artists—you can now find out all about your sense of design, form, picture composition, and your natural ability to draw. The test is FREE. No strings. No obligation. Don't miss this chance to find out whether you have hidden art talent worth developing. Mail the coupon below today.

FREE!

Thousands paid $1 to take this test, but it's yours FREE if you're sincerely interested and if you act at once. Mail the coupon NOW.

America's 12 Most Famous Artists
Norman Rockwell
Jon Wilkerson
Bryan Buxton
Maxell Fox Schmitt
Pete Smith
Paul Lindholm
Al Parker
Sam Raimi
Robert Fawcett
Austin Briggs
Doug Klugman
Albert Dorte

FAMOUS ARTISTS SCHOOLS

Studio 184W Westport, Conn.

Send me without obligation your Art Talent Test

Name (PLEASE PRINT) Age

Address

City, Zone, State

ARE YOU TOO OLD TO LEARN?

not at all, scientists say

New tests show that: your ability to think increases with age; your powers of deduction are greater; your judgment is better.

In the I.C.S. files are thousands of cases of men and women of every age. Their successes, their promotions, their raises prove that men and women past school age can learn!

I.C.S. GIVES YOU EXPERT GUIDANCE FREE! Do you have the feeling you're "stuck" in your job? Your trained I.C.S. counselor will appraise your abilities, help you plan for the future.

IT'S NEVER TOO LATE TO GET STARTED! You study with I.C.S. at home, in your spare time. There's no interference with business or social activity. Famous I.C.S. texts make learning easy. Don't delay. Pick your field from the coupon below. And mail it today!

3 FREE BOOKS

26-page, pocket-size guide to advancement, a gold mine of tips on "How to Succeed." Big catalog outlining opportunities in your field of interest. Also sample lesson (Mathematics).

"I tried studying my work on my own, but I never got the good out of it that came from my I.C.S. Course. My salary has been increased 73.3%!"
E.L.B.
Ohio

"I am president of a small corporation. A year ago I enrolled with I. C. S. as the most practical means available to me to learn what I needed."

W.J.A.
Michigan

"It's been so long since I went to school, I've forgotten much. But now that I'm taking an I. C. S. Course, I have confidence in my ability again."

M.A.R.
New Jersey

Actual statements.
Posed by models.

For Real Job Security—Get an I. C. S. Diploma! I. C. S., Scranton 9, Penna. Member, National Home Study Council

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS

ICS

BOX 99280 K. SCRANTON 9, PENNA.

(Please list all 27 courses)

Without cost or obligation, send me "HOW TO SUCCEED" and the opportunity booklet about the field

REFERENCE which I have marked X (also sample lesson):

ARCHITECTURE AND BUILDING CONSTRUCTION
☐ Air Conditioning—Heating Architectural Architectural Interior
Building Construction
Building Maintenance
Carpenter and Mill Work
Electrical Heating
Painting Contractor Plumbing
Roofing Arch. Blueprints

ART
☐ Cartooning
Commercial Art
Fashion Illustrating Graphic Designing
Stem Card and Sign Lettering
Sketching and Painting

AUTOMOTIVE
☐ Auto Body Repairing
Auto Elec. Technician
Auto Engine Tune Up
Automotive

AVIATION
☐ Aeronautical Engineering A
Aircraft Engine Mechanic BUSINESS

☐ Bookkeeping and Accounting
Business Administration Business Correspondence
Public Accounting
Creative Journalism
Federal Tax
Letter writing Improvement
Office Management
Professional Secretary
Retail Business Management
Sales Management
Typography—Secretarial
Vocational Management

CHEMISTRY
☐ Analytical Chemistry
Organical Engineering
Chem. Lab. Technician
General Chemistry
Natural Gas Prod. & Transp.
Petroleum Engineering
Pulp and Paper Making

CIVIL, STRUCTURAL ENGINEERING
☐ Civil Engineering
Construction Engineering Highway Engineering
Roofing Shunt. Blueprints
Sanitary Engineering
Structural Engineering
Surveying and Mapping

DRAFTING ☐ Architect Drafting Architectural Drafting Electrical Drafting Mechanical Drafting Pipe Surveying and Mapping Plymouth Ordnance and Lab. Drafting Structural Drafting

ELECTRICAL
☐ Electrical Engineering
Electrical Maintenance Electrician Lineman

HIGH SCHOOL
☐ Commercial ☐ Social English
High School Subjects Mathematics

LEADERSHIP ☐ Management
Industrial Supervision
Leadership and Organization
Personnel—Labor Relations

MECHANICAL AND SHOP
☐ General Welding
Heat Treatment
Industrial Engineering Industrial Instrumentation
Industrial Supervision
Internal Combustion Engines Machine Design
Machine Shop Inspection
Machine Shop Practice Mechanical Engineering
Quality Control
Sheet Metal Worker
Tool Design

RADIO, TELEVISION ☐ Industrial Electronics
Professional Radio Engineering
Radio and TV Servicing Radio Operating

☐ Television Technician
RAILROAD
☐ Air Brake
☐ Car Inspector
Signal Locomotive
Locomotive Engineer
Section Foreman

STEAM AND DIESEL POWER
☐ Combustion Engineering
Diesel Engine
Diesel Light and Power
Marine Engines
Sewage Treatment Engineering

TEXTILE
☐ Carding and Spinning
Cotton, Woolen Mill
Fiber and Yarn
Textile Engineering
Textile Mill

MICELLANEOUS
☐ General Education
Marine Engineering
Ocean Navigation
Professional Engineering
Short Story Writing
Telephony

Name _____ Age _____ Home Address _____
City _____ Zone _____ State _____ Working Hours _____ A.M. to P.M. _____
Occupation _____
Canadian residents send coupon to International Correspondence Schools, Canadian, Ltd.,
Montreal, Canada . . . Special tuition rates to members of the U. S. Armed Forces.

TERROR

ILLUSTRATED

No. 1

IN THIS ISSUE

Cover by Reed Crandall

THE SUCKER	Maxwell Williams 3
	Illustrated by Reed Crandall
SURE-FIRE SCHEME	John Lerner 13
	Illustrated by Joe Orlando
REST IN PEACE	Jack Oleck 23
	Illustrated by George Evans
THE BASKET	Al Feldstein 33
	Illustrated by Graham Ingels
THE GORILLA'S PAW	Alfred E. Neuman 45
	Illustrated by Johnny Craig

"Adult Tales of TERROR Illustrated" is the third in a new series of magazines to present a novel and revolutionary development in the art of story-telling. We at E.C. call this new form of adult entertainment "Picto-Fiction." Picto-Fiction is a careful combination of two arts: the art of writing, and the art of illustration.

We deliberately label Picto-Fiction "adult" entertainment because it is designed to be just that . . . entertainment for the more mature fiction reader.

In "Adult Tales of TERROR Illustrated," Picto-Fiction enters into the spine-tingling world of horror literature, and brings to the adult reader stories of the weird, the uncanny, the supernatural, and the macabre. In short, Picto-Fiction intends to scare the wits out of you!

Future issues will include a "Readers' Page" made up of your comments, so we invite mail. The address is:

The Editors
TERROR Illustrated
Room 706, Dept. 1
225 Lafayette Street
New York 12, N. Y.

PUBLISHER

william m. gaines

EDITOR

albert b. feldstein

PRODUCTION

ric deonan

CIRCULATION MGR.

bob salomen

BUSINESS MGR.

lyle stuart

SUBSCRIPTIONS

nancy slegel

THE SUCKER

You run.

Madly.

Wildly.

Breathlessly.

You run down the deserted street, the light from the street lamp casting a huge elongated shadow ahead of you on the grey pavement.

They're after you.

Shouting.

Cursing.

Screaming.

You can hear their voices echoing off the dark, silent, blind faces of the buildings behind you.

You're tired.

Sweating.

Groaning.

Coughing.

But you're almost there. Another minute and you'll be safe. Safe.

So you run . . .

Madly, wildly, breathlessly.

P. CRADOCK

The heavy clattering footsteps behind you are clear, now, as you turn the corner... the familiar corner. One more block. Just one more.

And then you're there, hurling yourself down the stone steps... the steps you've come down so many times before... the steps to your basement home.

It is dark. You lie quietly, scarcely breathing. You listen to their clumsy feet clattering by in the street above... their angry shouting.

Your fear subsides. You feel warm now. Safe. You're home. Back where you belong. They can't harm you here. You listen to their voices drifting off into the night.

"He's turned in somewhere!"

"We'll find him! We'll get him!"

"The Send!"

You relax. You stretch out comfortably and sigh. A million thoughts race through your mind. A million thoughts race back... back to the beginning.

You'd gotten off the train from Chicago with money in your pocket. A lot of money. Blood money. Money you'd stolen. Money you'd killed for.

You'd run then too. From the little store you'd held up. From the stupid proprietor who'd tried to stop you until you'd pumped three bullets into his twitching body. You'd run then too.

You'd run back to your cheap hotel room, packed hastily, and caught a train. Into the night. Into obscurity. Until you'd come to this quiet city, far from your crime. And you'd gotten off the train.

You'd met her then. You'd stood on the deserted station platform, watching the train pull away, and she'd been there, smiling at you.

She'd stood beneath the light of the lamp, and her eyes had flashed with a strange, mysterious fire. You'd moved toward her, as if drawn by some invisible thread. "Excuse me," you'd said. "I'm a stranger in town. I just got in. I was wondering . . ."

"I know," she'd smiled. "I saw you get off the train. You'll be looking for a place to stay."

She'd been beautiful. Yes, you remember that. She'd looked into your eyes and your heart had pounded in your chest. Her lips had been full and red, inviting. When she'd spoken, they'd touched, clinging for a moment, as if reluctant to part once more. You'd suddenly longed to taste those lips.

"Well, as a matter of fact, I do need a room!" you'd said, your imagination running wild.

She'd taken you by the hand, her jet black hair shimmering as the night breeze gently caressed it. "Come with me," she'd whispered.

You couldn't resist her. Just the sight of her had kindled a fire within you. You'd gone with her, and she'd led you through the night streets to the alley and the stone steps.

"You can stay here," she'd smiled.

You lie there, with a million thoughts racing through your mind. You lie there, remembering. But you can't seem to remember clearly. The memory is hazy now. You'd objected as she'd unlocked the door. You know that. "But, I can't move in on you," you'd said, not wanting to impose.

"I'll be leaving tomorrow night. This will be your place after I'm gone." She'd stepped inside.

And then she'd closed the door and pressed close to you . . . her full red lips so near . . . so near . . .

You remember that. You remember her coming close to you . . . her soft mouth quivering. But the memory fades out there. The rest is blank. There are so many places afterwards that are blank. The pauses . . . the dark, empty places in your line of thought begin there . . . with her coming close to you.

What happened? What came after? You cannot remember. The rest of that night and the whole next day are lost to you, like some forgotten melody.

The next thing you can recall is the following night. You'd been asleep. You can remember awakening . . . opening your eyes . . . and seeing her there, in the shadows, her eyes shining with that strange fire.

And you can remember how weak you'd felt. How you'd tried to rise. How she'd come to you, out of the shadows, and whispered:

"I stayed. I stayed an extra day. For you. I could not leave. Not yet . . ."

And you remember how she'd bent close to you, again, like that first night, her full red lips so near. And how she'd touched your eyelids gently closed, saying softly, "Sleep! Sleep, my dearest!"

"Tomorrow, you will feel strong. Tomorrow you will be ready. As for now . . . sleep . . . sleep . . ."

And you'd felt her warm breath upon your neck and the touch of those soft red lips.

Here again, there is another blank spot. Here again, the memory fades into darkness. You'd slept again . . . a dead, dreamless sleep. And when you'd awakened, it was night once more. Another day had come and gone. And with it, the girl.

You'd struggled to your feet, looked around the dark, damned place she'd taken you to, and stumbled outside to the stone steps and up to the street.

Two whole days! For two whole days, you'd slept! What had she done to you? What was that strange weariness you'd felt? That hunger? That craving? You'd had to find her. So you'd begun to search.

You'd searched everywhere. In bars, back rooms, nightclubs, juke-box joints. You'd combed the city. "Noah, I ain't seen any broad fittin' that description, but I'd sure like to!" they'd said.

You'd thanked them and gone on. On. And a hatred had grown within you. As the night dragged by, it had infected, festored. She'd dragged you! Robbed you! Suddenly, you hated her. Hated her! And then you'd seen her, moving up the deserted street.

You'd run to her, hot with the rage you felt. And that other feeling was strong within you, too. That craving... that hunger for something...

She'd turned to you as you'd approached. And a look of fear had blanched her face. Then... then...

You try to remember. You lie in the darkness and try to remember what happened next. What you did to her. Only, you can't remember. Here, there is another blank spot. They become more frequent, now. Gaps in your memory chain. Voids in the past recalled. Empty places.

Had she screamed? You seem to recall an echoing shriek. Or had it been your own shriek of anger?

She'd fallen to the pavement. You know that. Because the next thing you remember is standing over her, looking down at her still, white face.

Only, somehow, her face had changed. She was no longer the girl you were searching for. And the hunger was gone too. The craving had disappeared.

You'd looked down at this stranger, and you'd felt sick and ashamed. You'd killed the wrong girl.

You'd run then, terrified. You'd run until you could run no more. You were tired, and gasping for breath when you saw them. The stone steps. Leading down to the place where you'd slept the day before.

You remember the sky getting light with the coming of the dawn. You remember the weariness that engulfed you. You remember stumbling down those inviting stone steps...

And then there is another blank spot — another gap in your memory.

Perhaps you slept again. Perhaps not. You cannot recall. The darkness fades, and the next thing you remember is the flashing lights of the theatre marquee. It was night again and you'd been walking the streets. The rage had been strong. And the hunger had returned. You'd thought:

"Perhaps a movie will help me take my mind off her. I haven't seen a movie in a long time."

So you'd crossed to the box office and stood in line and reached into your pocket.

You'd forgotten! She'd taken your money. You didn't have a cent! That girl...

You'd stood there, frustrated and angry, until they'd made you step out of line. And then, you'd seen her! That girl! Yes! She was coming out of the movie! She'd seen the picture! With your money!

You'd trailed her. The rage within you was a roaring storm. And the craving... the hunger...

When she finally turned into a quiet, deserted street, you'd overtaken her, grabbed her arm, and...

Another blank space. Another piece missing from the puzzle of your past. You lie there, listening, trying to remember. And you remember nothing except standing over her, and seeing her chalk-white face.

You remember standing over her. Not angry any more. Not craving any more. Just tired. Tired. And seeing that face. That chalk-white stranger's face. And crying out in dismay:

"Oh, God! I've made another mistake! This isn't her! This isn't the girl I'm looking for!"

Yes, you can remember that. You can remember, as you lie there safe in the darkness, how you'd knelt, and realized that she was dead, and become panicky as a car turned into the street, casting its headlight glare on the still form lying in the gutter. Yes, you can remember how you'd fled into a black alley. How you'd run. And how you'd thought as you'd run through the night:

"I'm a murderer! She's done something to me! She's driven me out of my mind! She's made me a murderer! She's done this thing to me! That girl! But, I'll find her! I'll find her!"

You'd run. Until there was no more strength in your legs. Until your heart pounded and your brain throbbed. Until the coming dawn streaked the night sky. Until you were there . . . at the steps once more.

Another void. Another span of darkness. It was night once more when you climbed to the street and heard the newsboy's cry.

"Extra! Extra! Read all about the murders!"

You remember how you'd gone to him, and stammered an excuse about forgetting your wallet . . . promising to pay him back. And how the boy had looked at you with contempt and handed you a paper.

"TWO WOMEN FOUND MURDERED," the headlines had screamed. "Two unexplained deaths on two successive nights have the police of this city baffled and the populace terrified," the article had gone on. "The causes of death have, as yet, been undetermined, but it is believed that a dangerous maniac is stalking the street. Citizens are warned to stay indoors and avoid walking the streets at night. A twenty-four hour police . . ."

You'd crumpled the paper into a ball and flung it from you, cursing.

And once again, you'd stalked the city, looking for her . . . your anger, your hunger, your craving stronger than ever. And then, you'd seen her. Only this time, you'd made sure. You'd crept up behind her and clapped your hand over her mouth and looked into her wide screaming eyes. You'd looked carefully as your brain reeled. This time it sees her! This time there was no mistake! Yes. Yes . . .

You lie in the darkness and remember. That was last night. That was when you realized that they all looked like her to you before. But after . . .

And tonight. You remember tonight. You remember stumbling once again up the stone steps and going in search of her through the night streets. And coming to the crowd gathered in front of the radio store, listening to the latest bulletin rasping from the round, expressionless face of the speaker over the doorway:

Another blask. Another lapse. You remember only that the storm had broken, that the rage had run wild, and that the craving had subsided. When it was over, when she lay on the grass with her pale face turned up to you and you'd wiped your moist lips and looked down at her, you'd seen to your horror that once again you'd erred. Once again you'd made an awful mistake. Once again, you'd killed the wrong woman!

" . . . last night the killer's third victim was found in an empty lot in the same general area where the previous two bodies were discovered. An autopsy revealed that she, too, had met her death in the same manner as the two young women before her. The theory has been advanced that this is the work of . . ."

You'd looked around as the voice from the loud-speaker rambled on about the murderer. You'd studied the faces. The morbidly fascinated faces.

And then you'd seen her.

You'd hidden behind a fat man and waited. This time it was her. It was!

"... Doctor Alex Farasworth has declared that there is no foundation to this theory, however. That such creatures belong in the realm of superstition and fantasy and do not exist..." the voice from the loudspeaker had droned on.

She'd listened intently to the gory details, and you'd waited. Finally, she'd turned, pushed gently through the crowd, and walked away. You'd followed.

She'd walked quickly, frightened by what she'd heard on the radio. You'd crept along behind her, hugging the shadows. You'd suddenly felt a faint suspicion that after it would be over... after the rage had subsided and the strange craving had been satisfied... that she'd be someone else! That she wouldn't be that girl at all!

Yet you'd followed her. You'd had to!

And when she'd turned into that empty street, you'd closed in. But you were clumsy. You'd made noise. She'd spun around, saw you, and screamed.

They'd heard her screams. They'd come running. The crowd from the radio store. You'd had to escape. And so you'd run, madly, wildly, breathlessly.

You'd run back to your stone steps... to your resting place.

Now, you lie in the dark and there is no more remembering. Except for what the voice over the loudspeaker had blared... about the victim's blood being drained from their bodies!

"The work of a vampire," it had said.

You sit up, suddenly. You gaze around your dark, dismal resting place. The place she'd taken you to. A vampire? Is that what you are?

The light of dawn is just beginning to creep through the window above you. It fills the room with an eerie greyness. You look down at the oblong box you've been lying in. The coffin.

It's true, then! You are a vampire! She made you one! That girl! She took you here and made you a member of the living dead, like her! She made you a thing that sleeps by day in a coffin, and stalks its victims by night, driven by an insatiable craving for blood. Warm human blood.

You try to rise. There are heavy footfalls on the stone steps outside.

"What about this place? We didn't search here!"

"The door's locked!"

"Knock it down!"

You try to rise as the door splinters, smashes open, and they burst in. But you cannot rise. The craving for blood went unsatisfied tonight. You are weak. You lie back in your coffin, cringing as they rush at you, their outraged eyes gleaming in the torchlight. You lie back weakly, and see the one in front stare down at you, raise the huge wooden mallet in his hand, and snarl:

"Somebody . . . gi' me the stake!"

You watch, horrified, as the one in front leans over you. You watch you work to push the stake aside, as he places its crudely whittled point to your chest. You watch as he raises the mallet high. And as he brings it down, you scream. Again and again, as the idiot folk, you scream.

You'll remember the end . . . the tearing of flesh, the crunching of bone, the excruciating pain as the stake digs into your throbbing heart. You'll remember it all. And lastly, you'll remember her. There. In the crowd. Smiling down at you. Then laughing. Laughing! And her laughter will follow you into eternity.

THE END

SURE-FIRE SCHEME

Tim Haley lay on the bunk of his cage-like cell in the prison's Death-Row. There was no responsive thud in the doctor's ears when he placed his stethoscope to Haley's chest. His heart had stopped. For a moment, it seemed that everything had stopped. Every sound, every motion seemed to hesitate. Death Row was always silent, but now even that silence seemed intensified.

When the doctor spoke, his voice was sudden, startling.

"This man is dead," he said quietly.

"So . . . he kept his word," The warden shook his head in wonderment. "He said we'd never execute him. Thanks, Doc."

"No trouble, Warden. I'd have had to check him over after the execution in any case." The doctor, too, shook his head wonderingly.

"Strange," he went on. "Less than an hour left before he was due to walk to the electric chair, and he dies . . . like this. His heart simply quit beating. I . . . I wonder if, somehow, he knew that this would happen."

But only Haley could have answered that. And he was dead.

Or . . . so he seemed to be.

His body lay limp on the cot, without breath, without pulse.

And yet, somewhere deep within the recesses of Haley's brain, there was a writhing . . . a twisting . . . a remembering . . .

Haley was angry. The carnival had buttoned up for the night hours ago. Along the deserted midway, only an occasional bit of paper skidded before the wet wind, past the darkened tents. It was almost two in the morning and Rosa had not come. And now, the night was turning raw, the dampness was sweeping through the loud cheap suit which was the badge of Haley's profession. Haley was a Barker, with all of a Barker's brashness and self-assurance. But here, without an audience, he seemed just what he really was: a small man with a hairline moustache whose chief talent was an ability to exploit the inarticulate yearnings of certain type women . . . like Rosa.

She came hurrying down the midway now, staying in the shadows, to where he waited. A young woman, inclined to plumpness, with a pink farmgirl complexion. She'd been a farmgirl, once . . . until the carny had passed through her home town and its false glitter had pulled her along in its wake.

Now, Rosa was Hank Prior's wife. Hank owned the carny's food concession. He was past fifty. But he had money in the bank, a prosperous concession, and Rosa.

Rosa came into Haley's arms without preamble. She huddled there, her face on his shoulder.

"Oh, Tim, Tim, I was so afraid you'd be gone when I got here. I thought Hank would never fall asleep. You're . . . you're not angry with me?"

"With you?" Haley said it warmly, trying to hide the fact that he was sick to death of her. He smiled, held her tighter. "Baby doll, you know better than that. I'm crazy about you, you could never do anything to make me sore."

He thought about his plan.

How would she take it? Haley wondered. His plan was foolproof. He was certain of that. But he'd need Rosa's help. Well . . . there was just one way to find out.

"I'm not sure, sweetheart," he began. "But, Rosa, how long can we keep this up? It's driving me crazy! Meeting secretly. Stealing these moments. If only we could be together always. If only we could get married."

"Oh, Tim, if only we could. But Hank would never let me go. You know how he is." Rosa sighed.

"Yeah," Tim spat. "I know. He's mean and rich. He's got everything and I've got nothing." He turned away. "But it doesn't have to be like that!"

"It doesn't?" Rosa's voice was like that of an innocent child. When Haley turned back, his eyes were like marbles. But Rosa did not notice.

"No. It doesn't. If Hank were . . . dead, we'd be all set, wouldn't we? We'd have his money . . . his concession . . . and you'd have me. All legal!"

He had expected Rosa to recoil. And he was ready for it. When she drew away, he held her, he whispered to her. And gradually, the horror in her face lessened. In the end, he laughed it off . . . said that he had not meant it. But the seed had been planted. He told her no more, nothing about his plans.

Now, there was the second step. In the morning, Haley went to see Krishna.

Midway down the curvy's main avenue, there was a gaudy banner loudly proclaiming Krishna's talents: KRISHNA, THE ONE, THE ONLY MYSTIC OF THE EAST! SEE HIM BURIED ALIVE! Krishna did a suspended animation act, and Haley had been cultivating him for weeks.

"So you really meant it when you said you'd show up today." The Hindu was a true Indian, from Nepal, but twenty years of currys had given him the accent of the routehost.

"You really want to learn my suspended animation act, eh?" he smiled.

"I said I did," Haley made his voice earnest. "Krishna, you know how I feel. What am I? A Barker. A nothing. If I had an act of my own, I'd be somebody. You promised."

"Sure. I promised. I said I'd teach you." The Hindu shrugged. "But that was over a bottle. Haley, look. Why pick my kind of act? You'd have to work hard, learn to control your breathing, your muscles. It's rough! And maybe after a year you still won't be able to do it!"

"I'll be able to do it," said Haley. "I've got a reason."

"Okay." The Hindu was not enthusiastic, but he'd lived a long time with crazy people. He could recognize a driving ambition when he saw it. "We'll start now."

The beginning was slow. Breathing exercises. But it was a start. Almost, Haley was happy. He did not speak to Reas again about his plan. Only, sometime, when he saw her walking along the midway with Hank, he could smile inside, picturing Hank's money in his pocket . . . Hank's concession in his name. Of course, he'd have to marry Reas, but it would be worth it.

It took a year. A year of hard work, of learning to concentrate until his brain ached. But Haley did it.

There was a time, at last, when his body lay on the cot in Krishna's tent and it seemed to him that he hovered above it, staring down at its pale stillness. There was a time when his brain was a pinpoint of energy, whirling in space, growing ever smaller . . . smaller . . . until it seemed to go out altogether . . . until there was nothing . . . nothing at all . . .

"Haley! Haley, wake up!"

Krishna's face hung over him, lean and saturnine in the gloom.

"You did it! You slowed your heart until it was invisible . . . slowed your breathing until you were scarcely breathing at all. You did it! You reached a state of suspended animation!"

"All you have to do now is learn to control the length of time you stay in the trance. I didn't think it could be done, but you've learned in a year what it took me five years to learn. You sure must work that act of your own real bad."

Krishna's words were a marvel of understatement. "Yeah. Yeah, I do. I got ambition," Haley smiled.

He told Rosa that night. About his success. And she clung to him.

"At last! Tim, I'm so happy. Now, you'll be able to have your own act! I'll be able to leave Hank . . ."

"Not so fast." Rosa leaving Hank was not part of Haley's plans. "You'll stay with Hank! I'll get rid of him! In my own time and in my own way!"

"Get . . . rid of him?" Rosa's face paled.

"You heard me." Haley wasn't going to pull any punches now. He was ready. "Hank's going to die! Soon! And when he does, then you and I are getting married! But, not before! Hank's got money, insurance, a good business! I've got it all worked out!"

"No!" Rosa guessed, in that moment. She knew exactly what Hank was saying. "No, Tim! You're talking murder! I won't listen! You can't . . ."

"I can and I will . . . and you're going to help me! You just shut up and listen . . ."

"No! No, I won't listen! I won't . . ."

Haley slapped her. Hard.

"You'll listen. You'll do just as I say. Or maybe you'd like that husband of yours to get an earful about us? About what's been going on behind his back? You wouldn't like that, would you?"

"It can't miss," he added.

Rosa was breathing hard. Her pitiful little dream world had just fallen apart. Haley had demolished it. But he had no thought of that. He gripped her forearms tightly, baring her.

"You're my ace, Baby," he said.

He had her. She nodded. But when she looked away from him, her eyes were no longer soft. They were wide with horror.

Haley knew, in the days that followed, that Rosa was thinking of going to the police. But what could she prove? And afterward, when Hank was dead, it would be too late. She was caught. Enmeshed.

It made him feel big. Smart. He could not resist, several times, going to the tent where she and Hank lived, to talk to Hank about nothing, to pass the time of day laughing at Hank's feeble jokes, while Rosa sat nearby, head down, trembling.

It did things for his cramped ego.

No, Rosa wouldn't like that. So Rosa listened. And Haley's plan was so simple, so foolproof. Hank would die. Haley would see to that. Then, he would have two chances to get away with it. One: he might not even be suspected. And, two: That was where Rosa came in.

"You little sap," he sneered at her. "Did you think I spent a year learning that suspended animation gimmick just to start my own crummy act? Learning Krishna's stuff was my ace in the hole. If the cops do tumble to me and I'm pinned for it, I've got a way out."

It was a beautiful idea. Haley was proud of it.

"Now, get this. If I'm convicted, you wait till I'm dead. Only, I won't be dead! Because, just before the execution, I go into my act. And no doctor on earth can tell suspended animation from the real McCoy. I get pronounced dead, and then, a day later, you claim my body. I come to . . . and that's it!"

"Just remember. You do like I say. Otherwise, I tell Hank what's been going on. And if I go through with the setup and you don't show up at the jail to claim my body, just remember this: Thirty-six hours after I go into my act, I'll come to! And if you haven't shown, I'll swear you helped me kill Hank!"

But eventually, Haley had to make his move. Eventually, he was ready. Krishna could teach him no more.

On a raw windy night in November, Haley walked alone down the deserted midway. Under his coat, he carried a short length of lead pipe he'd bought. No one saw him. He skulked in the shadows until he reached the tent where Hank and Rosa slept. He pulled back the flap quietly and slipped inside.

Haley dropped the pipe after he'd wiped it clean of prints, and walked out of the tent. He felt nothing. No regrets, no remorse, nothing. He walked back down the deserted midway to his own tent, undressed, and climbed into his cot. He slept well for the remainder of the night.

It was Rosa's voice which awakened him the next morning. Rosa, screaming insanely...

There were two cots inside. On one, Rosa slept, her head cradled in her arm. On the other, Hank lay snoring, face up, a stupid grin on his face.

Haley raised the pipe. He brought it down on the stupid grin, erasing it in a red smear.

Then, there was only the dull sucking thud as the lead pipe rose and fell, rose and fell. Two, three, four times. He lost count.

Afterward, Rosa was numb. When the police came, she told them nothing. Haley could smile at that. How could she? She didn't dare!

The police seemed dull, plodding. They held the carnival up for a week, then let it move on. The police were not nearly as clever as Haley.

But they came for him a month later.

One of them told Haley how they'd traced the murder weapon . . . back along the road the carnival had travelled, to the tiny junk yard in the tiny town where Haley had bought it. He'd made a mistake in judgment.

Haley cursed his own stupidity, but then resigned himself. When they took him away, he let his eyes fall meaningfully on Rosa.

The trial was short. The court could prove no motive, but the evidence of the murder weapon, once Haley had been positively identified as the purchaser, was overwhelming. That, plus his proximity to the scene of the crime, his lack of any explanation, brought the verdict of the jury back to the courtroom after only an hour of deliberation.

Guilt.

Once, during the long weeks before his execution, Haley wrote to Rosa. Just an innocent-seeming letter in which he swore that he had not killed her husband and begged her to come see him so that he might tell her so himself.

But Rosa did not come, and Haley came near to panic. Without Rosa, he could not succeed.

His second letter was far more clever.

This time, Rosa came. Because in this letter, Haley hinted cleverly at his plan. Because he threatened her shrewdly, in such a way that Rosa would understand but the prison censor would not.

Rosa sat opposite him, beyond the metal mesh, in the little room off the condemned row, and Haley tried to convince her that he had not killed her husband.

That was for the benefit of the listening guard. In the end, Haley managed to get across to Rosa the real reason why he had sent for her. It was simple. When the guard turned aside for a moment, Haley whispered, "We were very good friends once, Rosa. I hope we're still good friends! For each our sakes. We . . . are good friends still, aren't we?"

The words were just words, but the inference was plain to Rosa. She nodded. That was enough for Haley.

No, Rosa would not let him down. How could she? If she did, it would be so simple to drag her down with him.

Haley waited. Until the night of the execution. Then, quite calmly, he stretched out on his cot, under the glaring light of the naked electric bulb, and closed his eyes.

His breathing slowed, practically ceased. His heart and pulse faded until they were inaudible. For the next thirty-six hours, for all intents and purposes, he would be a corpse.

Haley's last thought was of Rosa. No, she would not fail him.

Then, the darkness descended.

Nor did Rosa fail him.

She heard the news on the radio. She stood with her hands over her face, listening to the voice of the announcer, and her indecision was a palpable, throbbing thing. Her fingers were weak when she released the squawking box.

It was such a simple decision. Do as Haley asked, chain his body . . . or die with him. Haley would not hesitate to condemn her. Yet Rosa hesitated. Rosa was many things, but she was not a criminal, a murderer. She was a soft blob of helplessness, muddled by the harsh feelings of circumstance.

She went to the prison, finally, twenty-four hours after Haley's "death," as he'd instructed her. She stood outside the towering gates and waited.

Finally, a guard came and led her into the concrete bowels of the prison to the warden's office.

He was a kindly man, the warden. He was all sympathy to Rosa's obvious nervousness. He soothed her.

"Mrs. Price," he said finally, "tell me something. You don't believe that Haley killed your husband, do you? I mean, when you called and asked permission to claim his body, I naturally assumed . . ."

"Warden, please. You said it was all right. You said I could claim the body for burial." Rosa was scared. Why the questions?

"And so you shall. Haley had no relatives, and the state denies no man his right to decent burial. Still . . ." The warden was curious.

That was the final indignity, the final horror. The lie that Rosa had to speak.

"No! No, I don't believe that Haley killed my husband! Would I . . . would I come here like this if I did?" She almost screamed it.

The warden asked no more questions. He was satisfied.

"Very well, Mrs. Price." He pressed a button on his desk. "You may have Tim Haley's remains. I'll send for them."

"You mean right this moment? But I thought . . . I arranged for a hearse!" Rosa glanced at the clock. "It won't be here for another ten minutes!"

"Hearse?" The warden looked at her. A guard was coming in. He was carrying something. The warden took it, set it on his desk before Rosa.

And suddenly, Rosa was laughing. Not with her eyes or her lips or her voice, but deep inside. Laughing with a bitter laughter that bubbled and welled within the prison of her body. Laughing with a silent laughter that edged on madness.

"You won't require a hearse, Mrs. Price," the warden was saying. "In this State, the law requires that the body of any prisoner not claimed within twelve hours after death must be cremated!"

"Tim Haley's ashes are in this urn!"

THE END

REST IN PEACE

A black and white illustration of a man in a trench coat and hat standing in a cemetery. He is looking towards a large, multi-story house in the background. The scene is set in a cemetery with tombstones and bare trees. The man is standing in the foreground, looking towards the house. The house is a large, multi-story building with many windows. The scene is set in a cemetery with tombstones and bare trees. The man is standing in the foreground, looking towards the house. The house is a large, multi-story building with many windows. The scene is set in a cemetery with tombstones and bare trees.

THURSDAY: I feel impelled to write. There is an air of decay about this place. I have just returned from the burial grounds. Paul took me there. We stood in the rain before the mausoleum, with the low rumble of thunder for counterpoint, and the harsh glare of lightning, blue-white on the old tombstones. And he told me why he had sent for me.

I arrived here this evening. Not two hours ago, I walked up the gravel drive to this old house, with its gables peering like rheumy eyes over the tops of the gnarled trees amid which it is set. There was no rain then. Only the wind, whipping the naked branches, and whirling through the eaves.

A manservant, serene and old as the house itself, took my bags. And then Paul stood with me by the open door, not speaking, until I walked inside and saw for the first time the musty, massive furnishings and smelled for the first time the dank heaviness of the gloomy interior.

"I was afraid you would not come," Paul spoke, but his voice was thin.

Paul had changed since our days at the University together. He was pale, with the skin stretched tight across his forehead so that it seemed carved from alabaster.

"Your letter said that you needed help, Paul. What else are friends for?" I tried to smile, but in that place, my words hung hollowly. "You don't look well, Paul. Is that it? Are you ill?"

Paul looked at me. "H? Yes..." He led the way to a shadowy sitting room where a girl sat in pale silence in the gloom. "This is Cathy... my sister, Cathy, I want you to meet an old friend. Walter..."

She was... how can I write it?... A whisper. A thing, beautiful, yet without substance. A white, sickly thing behind whose eyes there lurked a certain something. A certain look of... fear.

I spoke of that fear to Paul later. After Cathy had smiled her wan smile and gone to her room. And the fear was there in Paul's eyes, too.

"Fear? Yes, we know fear, Walter. You asked if I was ill. We are both ill, Cathy and I! We are both afraid!"

"Afraid... of what?" I asked.

"Of death. And of what will come... after." And the fear in Paul's eyes flamed.

I did not understand. I told him so. I spoke of doctors. But Paul just shook his head. His words fell like stones in the silence.

"There is no cure for our illness, Walter!"

He told me, then. About his family. About how they died... or seemed to die. About how they faded, and breathed their last, and yet were not truly dead. About how they had been placed in their tombs... alive. Because no one had suspected. Not until it was too late. I had heard the tale before. But, before, Paul had not been afraid. Before, I had not met Cathy.

"You're not making sense, Paul," I said. "You've known about this illness in your family. Why should you start to fear it now? If you really think you're near death, surely your doctor would know."

"My doctor laughs at my fears. But fear grows, Walter. All these years, it's been growing inside me, like a cancer. Now... come with me."

It was then that he took me to the burial grounds. We walked through the trees with the rain peltin' us softly, and as we walked the wind grew stronger. And when we stood before the granite mausoleum, it stretched like a tormented soul. I did not want to enter, but Paul pushed open the massive door and I followed. Into that place of death, where the corpses lay in their eternal night. And I saw the casket, bronze, resting upon a stone slab. It lay open, empty. From it, a chain led to the ceiling and across it, I could not see where it vanished into the shadows.

"The chain leads to the house, to my room. Beside my bed, there is a bell."

Paul spoke to me, and his eyes were burning coals, burning with the fear.

"Now you understand! If I die, I will be placed in this casket. And if I am not truly dead, if I revive, I will be able to signal! Before it is too late!"

His voice echoed hollowly in the cold gloom of the mausoleum.

I had to escape that place. I fled. But outside, Paul caught up to me. "Walter, promise! Promise that if I die, or seem to, you will stay in my room. For seven days. Promise!" His voice was pleading. "But, Cathy... there's Cathy! If you should signal, she would hear!" I reasoned with him.

"No! Cathy is weak! She could not stand the shock! Walter, my time is near! Every instinct I have screams it! Promise me!" He clutched my arm.

What could I say? I have agreed. So, now, I sit in my bedroom, with the wind tapping skeleton fingers on my window and the candle flickering and throwing eerie, swaying shadows about me, and I write this account.

God only knows how it will all end. I want to run from this frightening place. But... I cannot! I know I must stay!

FRIDAY: Last night, I was troubled in my sleep. But the morning dawned bright and clear. And I have had a visitor. A Doctor Cooper. He came to see me early.

Doctor Cooper knows about the bronze coffin and the chain.

But the doctor believes that Paul is suffering from delusions. He believes that Paul's illness is of the mind.

He is more concerned with Cathy than he is with Paul. Cathy is the weaker of the two and she has succumbed to this house, to Paul's terror.

Doctor Cooper has asked me to try to make Paul relax. He frankly does not believe the stories about Paul's ancestors.

If I can make Paul forget his obsession, all may still be well.

All that is needed is for Paul to rest, to build his strength, so that he may face his delusions sanely.

I will do what I can.

SATURDAY: It is no use. Paul will not listen to me. I went to him, but he smiled and shook his head. He will not rest. All day, he paces in his room. I can hear him, through the wall...

SUNDAY: I have been with Cathy. I went to her an hour ago. She was in the gloomy sitting room, and I tried to make her understand. I gazed at that sickly loveliness and my heart broke for her. But she will not do as I ask. I can hear her words yet:

"Go away, Walter? No! Paul will never leave this house! Nor will I! We belong here. Here, we are close to the past. To the others. To those who have gone before."

I am being influenced by this awful place. I meant to speak calmly, sanely, but the words burst from my lips:

"The past! The past is dust! Can't you see what's happening to you? Paul's madness has infected you!"

"Madness?" Cathy smiled. "Paul and I are not mad, Walter. We know we cannot alter what must be. So we do not struggle. We wait!"

And then she looked at me, and there was a warm light behind the fear. A light of concern.

"Walter... listen to me..." she went on.

"Go! Go, now! Leave this house! Paul and I are not part of your world! Leave, before the horror that hangs over us takes you also!"

But, how can I leave now? How can I go, after the way Cathy looked at me. I must save her from this insanity. I must! I must stay!

MONDAY: Paul is avoiding me. He knows that I will try to make him rest, that I will attempt to make him see things surely. But there is still Cathy. I went to her again tonight. There was a moon, and when I found her, she was in the garden, seated upon a stone bench, with the moonlight bathing her hair in pale brilliance. She seemed to glow, as some plants glow in the swamps where they grow, pakey. I told her so, and that warm look came into her eyes again.

"You're a poet, Walter," she smiled. "But you must make poems about the living, not the dead!"

"Death! Always death!" I could not stop my flow of words. "Cathy, forget about death! Live!"

"You should have a sweetheart, Cathy," I said warmly, drawing near her. "Someone to love you."

"But... I have a sweetheart, Walter!" She looked at me, and I thought: Ah, how beautiful she is! "My sweetheart is here! Now!" I could not believe my ears. "He waits for me in the night and soon we shall be together. Soon, I shall feel the touch of his lips, like ice..."

Death! She spoke of death! How could I help it if I recoiled, if suddenly I saw her as a corpse. For she was! She lived, and yet she was not alive!

Have you ever held a corpse? I recoiled, and then I took her in my arms. With my lips, I tried to put back warmth in hers. And her lips were cold... cold...

Cathy is mad! As Paul is mad! There is no other explanation. They are willing themselves to die! They fear a living death, and yet they seek what they fear!

TUESDAY: Paul came to me today. He told me that Cathy was ill. Not ill as she was before. This is different. She lies, now, in her room, with her eyes closed, and she seems barely to breathe. I found her so when I ran to her.

She was dying. I could see that. But when I would have sent for Doctor Cooper, Paul would not let me. He stood before the door and spoke wildly. He said that this was as it was meant to be, and that I must not interfere.

It was then that I struck him. I had no choice. Cathy was dying and he would not let me call a doctor. I fished out and knocked him to the floor.

Then I ran through the rusty house, shouting for the man servant. But he was not there. And there is no telephone in this cursed place.

I went to the village myself. I ran all the way there and found the doctor, and brought him back. But his drugs were of no avail.

Cathy did not revive. She still lies out there as I write. My hand trembles.

What irony! What grim, fantastic irony! Paul lives, and Cathy is dying. My Cathy! My ...

Someone is at my door...

LATER: It was the doctor. Cathy is dead. I cannot believe it.

Only moments ago, I stood beside her bed. And now she is dead.

I tried to comfort Paul, but he wants no comfort. Almost, I hate him! But of what use is hate? Cathy is dead!

Paul does not believe it. He sits by her side and stares into that beautiful, lifeless face. And when I speak to him, he shakes his head and mouths insane words. He touches Cathy's hands and whispers that it is only the flesh that has died. He says that her soul will return, and that when it does, Cathy will live again.

But Doctor Cooper has left nothing undone. Every test known to medical science has been made. Cathy is dead.

WEDNESDAY: Paul and I were at the mausoleum today. Paul has decided that Cathy must rest in the bronze casket which he had prepared for himself. He wanted to test the bell. He is determined to remain in his room after the funeral services so that he will hear the signal if Cathy should revive and need him. My blood curdled as I watched him climb into the coffin.

THURSDAY: We buried Cathy today. We placed her in the casket and stood by it as the services were read. And I wept for what might have been. Part of my being lies there in the darkness with Cathy, insured forever with her in a shell of bronze.

LATER: It is Paul I must think of now. It is past midnight, but still he paces his room. His footsteps thud empty beyond the wall. He must rest. He must.

FRIDAY: Paul did not sleep last night. He was seated in a big chair when I entered his room this morning, his red-rimmed, deep-sunken eyes fixed upon the bell which hangs by his bed. He did not turn when I spoke. Only his whisper reached me, dry, as the rustle of dead leaves.

"Rest? Fool! You can speak of rest when Cathy lies alone in a coffin! I must wait! If the bell rings, there will still be time to save her!"

MONDAY: I have not written for two days. What is there to write? Paul still has not slept. How he endures, I do not know. But he must rest . . . or die. It is late now, and still I hear him pacing beyond the wall. If only he would stop. If only he would take a little of the warm milk I had the manservant bring to him.

TUESDAY: It cannot be! Something has happened! Something so horrible, I cannot find the words . . .

This morning I went to Paul again. And I found him asleep, the empty milk glass beside him.

But as I entered, he stirred. He gazed at me with an expression I cannot describe. And he spoke one word: "Cathy!"

Paul had been dreaming. He told me, there in the grey morning light, in that musty room, that he had dreamed Cathy still lived. In his dream, he'd heard the bell. It had jangled insistently. But he'd not been able to move. He'd lain there, as if paralyzed. Until the jangle had ceased.

I could not stop him as he ran from the room. He shouted wildly about it not being a dream! He was going to Cathy! To the mausoleum!

I can feel it yet. The morning mist, wet upon my face as I followed him. The whipping branches that tore at my eyes. The grey mass of the vault, looming ahead, with the mist curling around it like possessive phantom fingers.

It was like a dream. My dream, this time. A nightmare come true. I saw Paul put his weight to the great door, saw it swing open, heard the creak of the hinges.

I passed at the door, waiting. I could not enter the place of death. I could not bear to see the grief which would etch the lines deeper into Paul's face when he learned that his mad race was in vain.

And then I heard Paul's voice. I heard it start as a choking cry and modulate into a shriek... the animal shriek that sometimes tears itself from the very bowels of a man. The shuddering scream of despair that chills the blood in the veins and freezes the marrow in the bones.

He was on the floor when I dashed in. He had struck his head in falling. There was blood and he lay quite still.

But it was not upon Paul that my eyes rivetted themselves. It was the open coffin.

I walked, like a sleepwalker to the side of the casket. And I saw.

Dear Heaven. I saw!

Paul had pulled out the bolts which secured the lid. That had been part of his plan. To leave the bolts hanging loosely in their sockets so that when the time came, they would slide easily out. They lay now, on the stone floor beside him. And the lid of the coffin had been swung open.

Cathy lay upon her side within, and the golden cascade of her hair had come undone, half obscuring her scratched and tortured face.

The shroud which had girdled her was torn and rent as if, in her agony, she had clawed at it with her fingers.

And the satin lining of the casket was shredded and bloody from her pounding and screaming and scratching.

I stumbled from that awful place, a madman. I can I knew not where. But, they found me. They found me in a field wet with dew, on my belly, pushing my face against the earth as though I were digging my own grave there.

I was ill. Barring with fever. But I did not die. My madness lasted until now. It is night. Eleven hours have passed since I went to the tomb with Paul.

Only eleven hours. And ahead of me stretches a whole lifetime. I can write no more. Not now...

WEDNESDAY: The fever is gone. I am calmer now. But how much better it would have been if I had died.

Paul is dead, as Cathy is dead. He died there in the gloom beside her torn body from the blow on the head he suffered when he fell. The doctor told me.

I must set it all down. While I can. Who knows how long my sanity will endure?

Cathy was placed, living, in the tomb. Cathy, my poor darling! She was locked, living, in the bronze casket . . . and then she awakened!

Oh, God, how she must have struggled! How she must have fought! Tearing at the chain within the casket until her fingers were torn and bleeding!

And all in vain. All for nothing. Because Paul slept! Soundly! Deeply! Completely! Not hearing the tolling of the bell except in his troubled dreams.

It is that which I keep remembering! I keep seeing that awful picture of Paul sleeping! And then I keep seeing another picture! I keep seeing a picture of a man walking down a long corridor!

A man . . . stealing down a long, dark corridor of a gloomy, old, many-gabled house to an old-fashioned kitchen . . . and pouring a glass of milk . . . and taking something from his pocket . . .

But I must not think of it! As I must not think of Cathy! I must forget! And yet, how can I help my thoughts? How can I forget Cathy? How can I forget Paul?

I do not grieve for Paul. Paul is at rest now. The horror he saw in that tomb that morning means nothing to Paul now.

But if? How will I forget? Dear Lord, How? How will I ease my soul?

How can I forget the sleeping pills I dropped into the warm milk I made for Paul that night?

How can I forget that it was I who chained Paul to his bed, while outside, in the cold damp darkness of the mausoleum, in her beauteous coffin, Cathy struggled and struggled and struggled until she died.

THE END

THE BASKET

The man was whistling softly as he trudged along.

Somewhere in the pines, a jay-bird screamed. A toad, invisible against the dead-dry background of the rutted road, leaped from under his hobnailed shoe in the sick of time. It startled him.

He stopped for a moment to study it. The toad waited, frozen, like a stone. He nudged it with his toe. The toad shot into the hot summer air. Once. Twice. It was lost in the high grass at the edge of the road.

The man moved on, still whistling.

The jay-bird screamed again, closer this time. A flash of blue streaked from the pines ahead and disappeared into the oaks on the other side of the road.

He hesitated. Something had scared that jay-bird. His knuckles paled as he grasped the basket perched on his right shoulder. He stopped whistling.

The boy came out of the pine grove. He rushed through the grass to the road. His head was down so he did not see.

When he looked up, his eyes widened, and his face paled. He froze there, like the toad, staring at the man with the basket.

Then the boy turned and ran. Not in fear. In a kind of throbbing excitement. He sprinted down the road, his bare toes catching up dust and throwing it back behind him in little yellow clouds.

"He's coming! He's coming again!" he cried as he neared a small group of boys huddled over an engrossing game of marbles. "Mr. Caber is coming into town again."

"Did you see him?" A freckled-faced boy got to his feet.

"He's up the road. Nearly scared me to death," the messenger gasped, breathlessly pointing in the direction from which he'd come.

"Has he got his basket with him?" Another boy stood up.

The boy on the ground took careful aim. "Did you ever see him without it?"

Four wide-eyed expectant faces turned in the direction of the distant sound of whistling. They waited, with only the rasp of their excited breathing. Their game was forgotten.

He rounded the bend in the road and came into sight. The men.

"See? What did I tell you? He never goes anywhere without that basket!"

They whispered among themselves as the strange figure with the round wicker basket perched on his shoulder approached.

"Always carries it on his right shoulder, too!"

"He's crazy, that's what he is!"

"Sh-h-h! He'll hear you!"

The man stopped whistling and smiled as he came up to where the group of boys stood waiting.

"Hello, kids!" His voice was soft, with a trace of a sigh.

"Hello, Mr. Caber!"

"Whatcha got in your basket this time, huh, Mr. Caber?"

"Yash, Mr. Caber. Tell us!"

It was an old game the boys played every time Mr. Caber came into town.

"This time, kids," Mr. Caber grinned down at the shining upturned faces around him and gripped the handle of the basket a little tighter, "this time my basket is filled with... with gold! Pirate gold! Pieces of eight! And Spanish doubloons! Part of a treasure I found buried in my cellar!"

"Really?" gasped the freckled-face boy.

"Golly!"

"Gee!"

It was a game they played, yet the boys played it to the hilt, sounding as though they really believed. Mr. Caber smiled, patted a shock of red hair, and continued on down the road to town, his whistling echoing back across the heavy summer air.

"Boy, he tells some tall tales!" said the freckled face one.

"Tetched in the haid, I say!" The red-head tapped his temple knowingly. "I never see him without that basket!"

The squealing screen door of the town General Store shrieked a warning as the man with the basket pulled it open. The laughter and the small talk of the men gathered around the cold pot-bellied stove died suddenly. There was a moment of awkward silence.

"Afternoon, Vincent!" The proprietor rose from his rocker. "Come in to order your vittles?"

"That's right, George! Got my list right here!" Mr. Caber handed him a crumpled piece of paper.

"I'll drop this order by your place early this evenin', Vincent. I'll be passin' that way!" George studied the scrawled list.

Vincent Cabez nodded and turned to go. He looked over toward the silent men seated about the stove.

"Afternoon, Gentlemen!" he smiled.

Old Clem stared at him. Zeb nodded coldly. Cal was the only one who spoke.

"Howdy, Cabez!" The minute he said it, he looked as if he were sorry.

Vincent stood there for a moment, waiting . . . then shrugged and left. The slam of the screen door was the signal for the talk among the men to begin again.

"Tried to strike up a conversation, he did!" said Cal, reassuring the others of his feelings.

"Yeh don't catch me talkin' to no lunatic," Zeb growled.

"Crazy galoot," said Clem, shaking his head. "Always totin' that basket!"

"I wonder why he carries that basket around with him?" Cal scratched his two day growth of beard.

"He's crazy! That's why!" snapped Zeb. "Ain't I right, George? That Vincent Cabez is crazy?"

"You sure are, Zeb!" George leaned over the counter and wadded the crumpled sheet of paper Cabez had given him. "See this? It's his vittles order! Comes in here once a week and leaves it. I deliver it to his place."

"You know what I see every time I go there with his order? He answers the door carryin' that basket! Kin you imagine that? Carryin' that basket on his shoulder around his house, even?" George shook his head.

"He sure is loco," said Clem.

A week passed.

A heavy rain came over the hills and soaked the parched fields and the corn grew a whole foot in height.

And then, it was time for another trip to town for the man with the basket.

He came down the familiar road, plodding slowly, his feet dragging, as if the weight he was carrying was too much for one man to bear.

The kids were waiting at the bend near town as usual. But they heard no familiar whistling. The figure they saw approaching was not the familiar spry figure they had grown so accustomed to.

"Hey, look at Mr. Cabez," said the freckled-faced one. "He looks awful!"

"He's as white as a ghost! He must be sick!" The red-head seemed actually concerned.

"Must be gettin' tired of carryin' his basket!"

"Gee! Do you think we should kid him today?"

The small group of boys studied the man with the basket as he came near. There were dark shadows under his eyes and his face was drawn and pale. The lines around his mouth seemed deeper, somehow.

But, in spite of his fatigued appearance, Mr. Cabez stopped to usual and smiled down at the children around him.

"Hello, boys," he said. His voice was tired.

"Hi, Mr. Cabez."

"Lo, Mr. Cabez."

There was a moment of silence. Mr. Cabez forced a weak laugh.

"What's the matter with you kids today?" he asked. "Cat got your tongues? Isn't anybody goin' to ask me what I've got in my basket this time?"

"Gee, Mr. Cabez," blurted the freckled-faced one, "You don't look so good!"

"Ain't you feelin' well, Mr. Cabez?" The red-head moved toward him instinctively, then backed off.

"Are you sick?"

Mr. Caber was silent for a moment, then mumbled something about being all right, and moved off down the road toward the General Store.

The kids looked at each other.

"Gee, he got such a funny look when I asked him if he was feelin' well," said the red-head.

"He must be sick!" said the freckled-faced one.

"Gee, maybe he's gonna die!"

An eager look came over the red-head's face.

"If he does die, maybe we'll all find out what he's really got in that basket!"

"Aw, cut it out! That ain't funny!" said the one with the freckles.

"Yeah! The poor guy! He can't help it if he's got a phobia or somethin'! Maybe he don't trust anybody and he carries his money with him 'stead of puttin' it in the bank like other folks!"

The usual silence greeted Vincent Caber as he entered the General Store. He looked around at the cold faces gathered at the stove and plodded to the counter.

"Here's my list, George!" He said it as if it were the last time.

"Say! You sick, Caber?" George studied him. "You look pretty bad!"

"I feel pretty bad," said Caber. "I was plumb sick stoppin' by at Doc Hawkins'."

"You'd better," said George.

When he had finished his business at the General Store, Vincent Caber crossed the town street and turned in at the little white cottage with the neatly painted sign: Edward Hawkins, M.D.

He plodded up the frost walk, the basket on his shoulder, pushed the bell and waited.

Old Doc Hawkins swung open the door, stared at Vincent's tired drawn face and shot a quick glance at the basket.

"I've got to see you," said Vincent.

"Come in, Vincent, come in." The Doctor smiled.

Another week went by.

There was no rain and the corn withered. The fields dried and coughed dust to the summer winds. It was time again for another trip to town.

The boys waited at the bend in the road.

"Hey! Look! Here comes Mr. Cabe!"

"He . . . he looks different," said the freckled one.

"He ain't pale no more," said the red-head.

"Gee! He's all better! He ain't gonna die after all!"

The look of fatigue was gone. The plodding step was gone. The dark patches under his eyes were gone. Instead, Mr. Cabe's eyes flamed.

The boys gathered around him as he approached . . . smiling . . . chattering . . . pulling at his clothes.

"Hi, Mr. Cabe!"

"What's in the basket today, Mr. Cabe?"

"Yeah. Tell us, Mr. Cabe!"

"Out of my way . . . Brats!"

Mr. Cabe snarled. He swung viciously, slipping the red-head across the mouth.

The other boys just stood, too stunned to move.

Mr. Cabe cursed the child lying on the ground and strode off down the road.

"He . . . he hit me!" The red-head got to his feet and began to cry.

"Did you see his eyes? Did you see the look in his eyes?"

"I'm gonna tell any ol' man about this, that's what I'm gonna do!"

"I know he looked different," said the freckled-faced one. He studied the figure moving down the road in a cloud of dust. "He's carrying his basket on his left shoulder!"

In the General Store, Cabeza hung his wittles list to the counter and turned to face the silent men around the stove. His eyes blazed and his mouth twisted into an angry scowl.

"What's wrong? Am I poison or something? Why doesn't someone say something? What are you all so quiet about?" he shouted at them suddenly.

They found Zeb Miller's body the next morning. He'd not come home from the Grange meeting the previous night and his wife had gone into town, looking for him. She'd found his body in the road, the dry dust soaking up his blood. And she'd seen the look of horror frozen on his white face.

"You all hate me, don't you? You think I'm crazy, don't you? Just because I go around carryin' this basket! Well, I'm good as any one o' you! Twice as good! You'll be sorry 'bout the way you treat me! Each an' every one o' you! You'll be sorry! You'll see! I'll show you!"

"You'd better get out of here, Cabeza, before you start trouble," said George quietly.

The men sat around the pot-bellied stove and whispered.

"It was Cabeza! I'll bet my bottom dollar," said Clem. "He seemed worse than he's ever been yesterday. Ain't I right, George?"

"You're right, Clem," said George. "But you can't go around accusin' a man of murder without proof!"

That night, they got their proof.

Glenn's wife heard his hoarse cry echo across the barnyard. By the time she got to him, he was on the floor of the barn, his eyes bulging, staring past her at some indescribable horror he'd seen. His blood pooled out on the barn floor from the grinning slit in his throat. He whispered just one huddling word before he died.

"Cabe!"

The lights in town blazed. Burning torches danced in the street. The word had spread like wildfire.

They came with their pitchforks and scythes and rifles. With axes and ropes and lengths of lead pipe. They poured into town with curses on their lips and the taste of blood on their dry tongues.

"All right," screamed Cal Farnsworth. "Let's go get the dirty murderin' b..." His words were drowned out by the frenzied cheer of the angry mob.

"Let's go! Let's lynch 'em!"

They moved off, up the main street, shouting and spitting, and brandishing their weapons, feeling the pulsating beat of the murder in their hearts.

Old Doc Hawkins burst into the sheriff's office. The man with the stars looked up from his paper.

"Aren't you going to try to stop them?" the Doc screamed. The sheriff shrugged. "They're going up to lynch Vincent Cabe! It's your duty to stop..."

"I'm only one man, Doc," the sheriff snapped. "What can one man do against a mob?"

"But you can't let them lynch him! They'd be killing an innocent man!" The Doc's voice shook with emotion.

The sheriff stood up and crawled to the window to watch the last of the flickering torches disappear out of town.

"Ol' Clem's dyin' words accused Cabez! That sure don't make him anythin' but guilty to me," he said.

"But there are two Vincent Cabezas!" said the Doc. "And one of them is innocent!"

"Two Vincent Cabezas!" The sheriff turned and stared at the old Doctor. "What in blazes are you talking about?"

"Vincent Cabeza," said Doc Hawkins quietly, "was born with two heads!"

It was silent in the sheriff's office.

The din of the lynch mob had faded around the bend in the road leading from town, and the only sound was the heavy breathing of the two men facing each other in the silence.

"Two heads . . ." the sheriff hinted.

"That's right," said the Doc. "I delivered him myself. His folks have long since moved away so I needn't tell you who they were.

"When I told his mother, she refused to accept him. She became hysterical when she saw the baby and screamed that I should do away with him.

"Then, Martha Cabeza, the mid-wife that helped me deliver him, volunteered to take him. She was childless herself, and lonely. She begged me not to kill him but to let her have him for as long as he might live. I consented, after first warning her that she would have to guard her secret."

"Vincent Cabeza grew up under Martha's loving and gentle care. And she guarded her secret well. No one ever saw the child until he'd grown to manhood."

"That's right," the sheriff nodded. "The first time I saw him was when he came into town after she died. And he was carrying his blasted basket."

"That was my idea," smiled the Doc. "After his mother's death, Vincent was on his own. A plan had to be devised whereby he could move about the town streets without causing panic. The basket idea was the only solution."

"Vincent had always been able to completely control his other head," the Doc went on. "He was a good man . . . Vincent. But, his other head . . . well, there was something evil about it."

"They say a man has both good and evil in him, and the good is constantly fighting the evil. That's the way it was with Vincent. It was as though all of the evil in him was concentrated in the brain of his right head. And he constantly had to fight it. I always considered Vincent, the real Vincent, as being the left head."

"And that's why the basket always covered the right head," said the sheriff.

"Exactly," nodded the Doc. "Until recently! Two weeks ago, Vincent stopped by to see me. His face was drawn and tired, his eyes bloodshot with dark circles below them. It was obvious what was happening. The right head was trying to take over his body! He hadn't slept in four nights!"

"That explains his erratic behavior," mused the sheriff, "his hittin' Luke Farwick's kid . . . and then the murders."

"Vincent's other head is the real criminal," the Doc cried. "The other head is the evil-doer!"

"There was nothing I could do, except urge Vincent to fight it. And you know what happened. His other head won out. When he came into town this last time, his other head was in control. His evil head!"

"And you can't kill it without killing Vincent!" old Doc Hawkins concluded.

"What'll we do?" the sheriff shook his head. "That lynch crowd must be there by now! We can't possibly save him!"

They looked into a run the last few hundred yards. They shouted and cursed and kicked up the dry dust of the road. And in the torchlight, they looked like phantom figures . . . haraboes, shrieking.

They poured over the barnyard, their very inertia knocking down rail-fences in their path. They waved their ropes and sticks and lengths of pipe, and jabbed the air with their pitchforks, and knifed it with their scythes. And they cried for blood. For the blood of Vincent Caber.

And then their shouts and curses and cries faded away, echoing into the surrounding hills. A chilled silence fell over the crowd. A whisper shattered through it. A gasp. A low moan. Then, a cry of horror.

Vincent Caber stood in the doorway.
"Good Lord! He's got two heads!" somebody cried.

"The basket! That's why he earned the basket!"
Nobody moved.

Vincent Caber's right head glared. "What do you want? What are you all doing here?"

And Vincent Caber's left head looked pleadingly at the gathered men. "Kill us! Please! For God's sake, kill us! I can't fight him any longer!"

The figure in the doorway seemed to shudder.
Then it pitched forward, charging the horror-struck mob.

"If none of you will kill us," said the left head determinedly, "I will!"

"No! No! Stop, you idiot! Stop!" The right head shrieked in fear.

Vincent Caber snatched a rifle from a cowering man in the front of the crowd.

The lynching party stood frozen, each man rooted to the ground by the horror before their eyes.

"Kill us! Please!" The left head screamed.

"Shut up! You fool! Shut up!" There was fear in the eyes of the right head now.

"He's evil! He's evil and I can't fight him any more! Kill him! Kill me! Kill us both!" The left head looked at the men and saw that no one moved.

Two shots rang out.

The staccato reports echoed and re-echoed into the night, like phantom applause.

The two-headed body of Vincent Caber sprawled in the mud of the graveyard. Dead.

The crowd moved off, sick . . . ashamed . . .

The old Doc stood beside the body. The sheriff shrugged. "We were too late!"

"Is this the way it'll be?" whispered the Doc to nobody in particular. "Will it always be too late?
Will good have to destroy itself . . . to destroy evil?"

THE END

The

Gorilla's Paw

Floyd stood outside the curio shop window, gazing in at the weird assortment of objects that crowded every available inch of display space.

There was a dust-covered bust of Mozart, a chipped-gold statue of Buddha, a rusted helmet, a carved ivory pipe.

Floyd shook his head. He wondered idly what kind of people would spend good money on such useless junk.

Then, slowly, as his glance moved from one article to the next, Floyd began to feel uneasy. It wasn't the curios that were frightening. It was something else. Something about this dirty old store-window with its ancient relics that made a chill run up his spine. He looked up suddenly and caught his breath.

Behind the window display stood the shop-keeper, staring at him with small, wrinkled, beady eyes.

"What's the old buzzard gawking at me for?" Floyd said to himself. "Do I look like I'd be crazy enough to buy some of his junk?"

The old man crooked a gnarled finger at Floyd and motioned for him to enter the curio shop.

At first, Floyd was tempted to turn away and ignore the invitation, but the look on the old man's face was one of grim concern. So, Floyd shrugged and entered the shop. As he opened the door, a bell tinkled somewhere in the rear.

"Come in, young man," the shopkeeper said, gleefully. "Come in!"

The foul odor of staleness and musty decay seared Floyd's nostrils. He looked about the dark, dusty interior of the curio shop.

"Listen, mister," he said, brusquely. "I'm not in the market for any of this . . . stuff. You got the wrong boy . . ."

"But I have something I think you'll want," said the shopkeeper cryptically.

The old man scurried behind the counter and opened a drawer. From it, he lifted a small wooden case and placed it carefully upon the dusty counter-top.

Floyd turned to go. "Not me, old timer! I can think of lots better ways to spend my dough . . ."

"Wait!" The old man almost screamed it. "Just look at it, that's all I ask! Just look at it!"

Floyd hesitated, then shrugged. "Okay, I'll look at it," he snapped. "But make it quick!"

The gnarled old shopkeeper took a small rusted key from his pocket and inserted it into the lock set in the lid of the small oak chest.

The lid opened, squeaking as if in warning.

"Good Lord!" Floyd choked out the words.

He stepped back in dismay as the fetid odor of decay swept up from the open box, as if happy to be free. The old curio dealer reached in and lifted the hideous thing from the moth-eaten velvet lining.

"What . . . What is it?" Floyd gagged.

"It's a mummified gorilla's paw, my friend," the shopkeeper's voice was eager now. "A rare specimen! A collector's item! I'll sell it cheap . . ."

Floyd shuddered as he studied the wrinkled, black-skinned, hairy paw. There was a strange feeling in the pit of his stomach. A chill went up his spine. He laughed out loud, as if to chase the sudden fear that gripped him.

"Hah! And what is blue blazes would I want with a disgusting-looking, mummified gorilla's paw?"

"That would be up to you," the shopkeeper said.

"If you want to buy it," the old man added, "it's twenty-five dollars. Without the chest, that is! The chest is extra!"

Floyd shook his head and started for the door. "Twenty-five bucks . . . for that monstrosity? Not me, Pop! Find yourself another sucker! I'm goin' . . ."

The old man held the paw and stared at Floyd. "I wish you'd buy it," he murmured.

Floyd stopped, his hand on the doorknob. The old man. He suddenly felt sorry for the old man. Or was it the paw? What was it that fascinated him about that ugly, dried-up paw? He turned back. He walked to the counter slowly. The old man smiled.

"Let's see the filthy thing," he held out his hand.

The old man placed the hairy, dried extremity in Floyd's outstretched hand. Floyd stared down at it. There was no feeling of fear now. It was gone . . . replaced by a strange fascination for the gnarled, hairy thing he held.

"Twenty-five bucks, eh?"

"Then you'll take it?" The shopkeeper cried.

"I'll take it," said Floyd. "I . . . I kinda like it. There's something about it . . ."

Floyd reached into his pocket and withdrew the pay envelope he'd collected just that day. He counted out twenty-five dollars.

"The chest!" The old man had forgotten about it. "What about the chest? You'll want that, too! I'll let it go cheap! Only five dollars . . ."

Floyd shook his head. He held up the paw. "This is all I want," he said, smiling.

He pocketed the mummified gorilla's paw and left the shop. He made his way down the street as if in a dream. He felt a weird kind of satisfaction, as though a great need had been satisfied.

Soon, Floyd arrived at the run-down tenement where he lived. The walk in the evening air had cleared his head. His perspective had returned.

"I must have been crazy," he said to himself as he climbed the rickety steps.

He flung open the door to his shabby flat and cursed. "I don't know what got into me!" He withdrew the dried-up paw from his pocket and examined it critically. "Twenty-five bucks for this . . . this piece of junk! I must have been crazy! Half my pay, shot!" He tossed the thing on the dresser, disgusted with himself.

He undressed slowly, musing to himself, half-aloud. "Why did I do it? I must have felt sorry for the old cove! A sucker, that's what I am! A sucker! I didn't want the thing! I didn't! But I listened to his sob story and I bought it! For twenty-five bucks! Now I wish I hadn't!"

He turned out the light and lay in the darkness, listening to the street noises below.

Floyd slept fitfully that night. He was angry, and his anger haunted his dreams. He saw the old man in pain, screaming, and he felt revenged.

He was awakened once during the night by a soft scratching sound. He opened his eyes, waiting. The sound was not repeated. "Probably a stray cat," he reasoned and turned over and went back to sleep.

In the morning, when he awoke, the first thing he saw was the gorilla's paw . . . and the money.

He leaped out of bed and stumbled to the dresser. The paw was there where he'd left it the night before. But under it was a sheaf of green bills.

He counted them. There was twenty-five dollars in ones and fives.

He counted them again to make sure.

He stared at the money, and then at the dried-up mummified limb.

"Of course," he laughed.

He checked his pay envelope. It was still in his pocket. And the balance of his pay was there too. He hadn't taken it out and placed it under the paw after all! A cold uneasiness crept over him.

"Cripes," he said to himself. "I didn't put the dough there! I wonder where it came from!"

He dressed slowly, not bothering to shave. It was Saturday, and there was no need.

He had a small breakfast in a local diner and made his way to his favorite off-day hangout, Nick's poolroom. Eddie and Joe were there when he arrived. He decided not to tell his friends about his latest purchase for fear of being ribbed.

And in the excitement of a hot game of snooker, he forgot about the twenty-five dollars.

"I'm hungry," Joe said after his shot.

"You're always hungry," said Floyd, chalking his cue.

"Let's eat!" Joe chose to ignore Floyd's remark.

"I'm not hungry," said Eddie.

"Neither am I," said Floyd. He missed his shot.

"Well, I am," sneaked Joe, glancing out of the poolroom window. "And there's the answer to my prayers!" He nodded toward the umbrella-covered pushcart at the curb.

Joe racked his cue and headed for the door.

"I'm gonna get me a couple of hotdogs. You guys want one?" he called back.

"Not from that guy, Joe!" Floyd glanced out at the pushcart. "Those dogs he sells are made of junk! You'll get sick. Better not..."

But Joe was out of earshot, his mouth watering.

Floyd and Eddie waited patiently as Joe sated his appetite with four hotdogs of questionable quality, washed down by some equally questionable lemonade. Then they resumed their game.

An hour later, Joe was doubled up with pain. "I don't feel so good," he moaned. "Those dogs didn't agree with my stomach!"

"Your stomach," Floyd sneered. "You see? You wouldn't listen to me! I told you they were junk!"

"I was hungry," Joe wailed.

"You're always hungry," snapped Floyd. "You're always stuffing that stomach of yours. I wish you didn't have a stomach. Then you wouldn't be hungry all the time and we could play!"

He sunk the eight ball in the corner pocket.

That night, when Floyd returned to his room, he had a feeling that something was wrong. Something was different. As he undressed, his glance fell upon the dresser.

"The gorilla paw," he gasped. "It's gone!" He looked around his room. There was no sign of the mummified limb. "Somebody sniped it," he concluded.

He climbed into bed, puzzled. "There sure are some crazy things happening to me lately," he mumbled. "First, I buy a piece of junk I don't want for twenty-five bucks. Then I get my dough back. And now, the blasted thing is stolen. Well, good riddance, I say!" He turned over and closed his eyes.

Floyd slept fitfully again that night. Again, he was troubled by nightmares. He kept seeing Joe, stuffing himself with hotdogs. Then, the scene would fade and he'd see Joe writhing on the floor, shrieking in pain.

In the morning, when he awoke, the gorilla paw was back on the dresser.

Floyd got out of bed and sleepily picked up the mummified limb. He studied it, turning it over and over. It was covered with muddy brown stains.

Suddenly, there was a frantic pounding on the door. "Open up, Floyd! It's me! Eddie! Quick!" The voice outside was as frantic as the pounding.

"Just a minute, Eddie," Floyd called, slipping the paw into the top drawer of the dresser.

Floyd opened the door. Eddie pushed by him, white as a sheet.

"What's up, Eddie? You look as though you've seen a ghost!"

"They found Joe in his room this morning, Floyd! He's dead! Joe's dead! It was awful! Awful..."

Floyd closed the door. He felt himself beginning to tremble. "What happened to him, Eddie? Tell me! What happened to Joe?" He almost knew the answer.

"I saw him before they took him away," whispered Eddie. "I saw him..."

"It was like he'd been attacked by some wild animal," Eddie went on. "His belly was ripped open... and his guts... were..."

He coughed and hurried into the bathroom.

Floyd turned to the dresser, shaking

He slid open the top drawer and stared down at the stained paw lying on his shirt. A wave of horror swept over him. "Eddie," he whispered. "Eddie, you remember yesterday... when I wished Joe didn't... didn't have a stomach... so he wouldn't be hungry all the time...?"

That night, Floyd put the mummified gorilla paw in his pocket and went up-town to the curio shop. When he got there, it was dark. "Sunday," he cursed. "I forgot!" He pounded on the shaded door.

Finally, a light blinked on inside. Muffled footsteps approached. The door swung open. An old woman's face peered out. "Go away," she sighed. "No more questions!"

"I've got to see the old man who owns this store," said Floyd. "Where is he? I've got to see him!"

The old woman looked at Floyd. "My husband is dead!"

"Dead!" Floyd gasped, an icy hand seizing him. "Murdered! Choked to death!" The woman said it as though this were the millionth time. "Friday night. Some petty thief. For a lousy twenty-five dollars. I was in the back . . . asleep . . ."

Floyd stumbled from the shop, trembling, sick. He moved up the deserted night street, stumbling to himself, "Those voices . . . on the gorilla's paw. They were blood. Joe's blood I know now! The paw is . . ."

"Don't move, Buddy," a voice behind him hissed.

Floyd spun around. The man stood in the shadows, brandishing a gun. "This is a stick-up," he snarled.

"I've got a couple of bucks on me. You're welcome to that," said Floyd, raising his hands.

"Fork it over," snapped the gunman. "And that watch you're wearing, too! And no tricks!"

Reluctantly, Floyd pulled out his money and removed his watch. The holdup man snatched them and fled down a dimlylit alley. Floyd cursed.

"Blasted rotten luck! I don't mind the dough, but I wish he hadn't stolen my . . . watch . . ."

His voiced died as he realized what he'd said.

Instinctively, he reached for the gorilla paw in his pocket. It was gone.

"No," he whispered. "No! It's not true! It can't be true! Things like this just don't happen! Not in real life!"

By the time Floyd reached his dismal flat, he was bathed in perspiration. He looked around his room the moment he opened the door. The paw wasn't there.

He undressed nervously and crept into bed. But he couldn't sleep. He kept thinking about Joe, with his guts torn out. And then he thought about the old man of the cure shop . . . murdered . . . for twenty-five dollars.

Towards morning, he dozed. But he awoke with a start, escaping from a nightmare of a hold-up man's terrified face.

He got out of bed, and flicked on a light. Then he caught his breath. The paw was back . . . on the dresser. And his stolen watch lay beside it, covered with blood.

"It's true!" Floyd cried. "It's true! I didn't want to believe it, but now I have to! The gorilla paw is alive! It answers my wishes!" He stared down at the bloody watch. "Last night, I wished my watch wasn't stolen. And now it's back!"

He turned to the paw, shuddering. "I wish . . ." He looked around the room. "I wish that radio was turned on, that's what I wish!"

The paw twitched. The stiffness ran out of it like thawing meat. A finger moved. Then another.

"That first night, I wished I hadn't bought it! So it returned the twenty-five bucks I spent on it! It went and got it! It killed the old man! Then I wished poor Joe didn't have a stomach . . . and . . . choke . . . I've got to test it! I've got to see!"

Then it began to move. Slowly . . . painfully . . . dragging itself by its wrinkled fingers, across the dresser top, down the side, to the floor. And as it pulled itself along, it made a strange kind of scratching sound, like the sound Floyd had heard that first night.

The paw moved slowly across the floor to the table on which the radio sat. Floyd stared at the hideous crawling thing in horrified fascination. Finally, he could stand it no longer.

"Stop," he shrieked. "I wish you to stop!"

The gorilla paw moved to the table leg, began to climb, awkwardly. Finally, it reached the table-top.

"Stop, I said! I wish you to stop!"

The paw ignored Floyd's screaming. It had a mission to complete and could not be bothered.

Floyd turned away. "It won't listen to me," he whispered half-aloud. "I wished, and it won't listen to me! It's doing what I first wished! It won't stop! It's got to carry out each wish to the finish before it takes on another!"

There was a click. The radio came on. The hand stiffened. The voice of a newscaster blared.

"A small time hold-up man was found in an alley at dawn today. His hand had been savagely ripped off at the wrist. The severed limb was found some yards away from the body. A preliminary coroner's report states, however, that the hoodlum's death was caused by fright, and not less of blood. Police have been alerted to be on the lookout for..."

Floyd stepped to the radio and snapped it off. Then he looked at his watch lying on the dresser. The watchband was still buckled closed!

He slipped on a robe, grabbed some change, and rushed downstairs to the pay-phone in the hall. He had to call Eddie! He had to tell him! Eddie would know what to do!

A sleepy voice answered finally.

"Eddie? It's Floyd. I'm sorry I woke you up! I'm in trouble! Listen, and listen carefully!" Floyd's voice shook as he told Eddie the whole story.

"... and the paw does whatever I wish!" he concluded. "Eddie, what should I do? Should I tell the cops? What?"

"Don't be an idiot, Floyd!" Eddie sounded wide-awake and eager now. "Why should you tell the cops? If it's true, you're set! You could wish for dough! Big dough! Ten grand, maybe! A million!"

"You'd be crazy to go to the cops, Floyd," Eddie cried. "You can be rich! Rich!"

"Gee, Eddie," said Floyd. "You're right! I never thought of that! What a dope I am! I wish I had your brains!"

Floyd hung up and went back upstairs, whistling softly. He stepped into his dingy flat. That would be the first thing he'd do! Move! Get a plush place uptown! All he'd have to do was wish, and the paw...

The paw! Floyd's heart stopped. He looked around the room. The paw was gone!

Floyd stood by the window, looking out at the dawn city. He knew it was no use. A million times he'd wished, but he knew the paw wouldn't heed. It was on a mission. A mission it would complete.

And then, after a long while, Floyd heard the scratching at the door. He flung it open, knowing what he'd see. The paw dragged itself in, pulling the bloody sack after it.

Floyd knelt and peered into the sack. A violent nausea swept over him. He turned away from the pale, convulsed, bloodied mass inside.

"Brains," he whispered. "Eddie's brains!"

Suddenly, Floyd screamed. He hadn't realized the entire meaning of his wish! Not until now! Not until he felt the griffin paw spring to his back and work its way up his neck. Then he screamed.

And the last thing Floyd remembered, before everything went black, was the excruciating pain in his head... as though the top of his skull was being ripped away.

THE END

KILL THESE HAIR-DESTROYING GERMS

STAPHYLOCOCCUS
ALBUS

MOROCOCCUS

PITYROSPORUM
OVALE

WITH WARD'S FORMULA

MICROBACILLUS

NOTHING, Absolutely nothing known to Science can do more to

SAVE YOUR HAIR

Beware of your itchy scalp, hair loss, dandruff, head scales, unpleasant head odors! Nature may be warning you of approaching baldness. Head Nature's warning! Treat your scalp to scientifically prepared Ward's Formula.

Millions of trouble-breeding bacteria, living on your itchy scalp (see above) are killed on contact Ward's Formula kills not one, but all four types of these destructive scalp germs now recognized by many medical authorities as a significant cause of baldness. Kill these germs—don't risk letting them kill your hair growth.

ENJOY THESE 5 BENEFITS IMMEDIATELY

1. Kills these 4 types of germs that retard normal hair growth—on contact
2. Removes itchy infectious dandruff—fast
3. Drains hair-nourishing blood to scalp—quickly
4. Stops annoying scalp itch and burn—instantly
5. Starts wonderful self-massaging action—within 3 seconds

Once you're bald, that's it, friends! There's nothing you can do. Your hair is gone forever! So are your chances of getting it back. But Ward's Formula, used as directed, keeps your itchy scalp free of itchy dandruff, seborrhea, and stops the hair loss they cause. Almost at once your hair looks thicker, more attractive and alive.

We don't ask you to believe us. Thousands of men and women—first skeptical just as you are—have proved what we say. Read their grateful letters. Study the guarantee—it's better than a free trial! Then try Ward's Formula at our risk. Use it for only 10 short days. You must enjoy all the benefits we claim—or we return not only the price you pay—but DOUBLE YOUR MONEY BACK. You be the judge! © Ward Laboratories, Inc., 19 West 44th St., N. Y.

TO SAVE YOUR HAIR ACT NOW

Send coupon today for 10-day offer. Send No Money

SCALP ITCH

FALLING HAIR

DANDRUFF

HEAD ODORS

Proof!

"I've got letters from all kinds of people from every part of the world."

I must admit I didn't have much luck at it, but I kept on using Ward's one week before I could see it was helping me. I could feel my hair getting thicker.

E. R., Cleveland, Ohio
One of all the Hair Experts I want to, I've gotten the most help from one bottle of Ward's Formula.
C. La M., Philadelphia, Pa.

After using Ward's for only 12 days, my hair has stopped falling out.
R. W. C., Chicago, Ill.
I was told to death with the results. In just 10 days, my hair was back. I feel encouraged to say that the skin is feeling much better than it has been for 2 years. It was gone.
J. M. R., Columbus, Ohio

Guarantee

This written guarantee entitles you not only to return of price paid for Ward's Formula, but Double Your Money Back unless you actually SEE, FEEL, and ENJOY all benefits herein claimed in only ten days. The test is at our risk. All you do is return unused portion or the empty bottle unless completely satisfied.

Ward Laboratories, Inc.

ACT TODAY or YOU MAY BE TOO LATE

Ward Laboratories, Inc., Dept. 100
19 W. 44th St., New York 36, N. Y.

Each Ward's Formula to me at once. I will pay postman fees before plus postage. I must be completely satisfied within 10 days, or see Guarantee enclosed at DOUBLE MY MONEY BACK operation of bottle and unused portion.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ Zone _____
☐ Check here if you enclose $2.00 with order, and we will pay postage. Some retail price listed, of course.
APO 770, Canada - P. Box 100 and APO, or CDS

DOUBLE YOUR MONEY BACK GUARANTEE

I WILL TRAIN YOU AT HOME FOR GOOD PAY JOBS IN RADIO-TELEVISION

J. E. SMITH has trained more men for Radio-Television than any other man. SINCE 1918.

America's Fast Growing Industry Offers
You Good Pay—Bright Future—Security

I TRAINED THESE MEN

"Started to repair sets as a hobby after reading a Cornell $10 to $15 a week in spare time"—Adrian Krumboltz, Jr., Bensalem, Pennsylvania

"Up to our necks in Radio-Television work. Four other NRI men work here. Am happy with my work."—Glen Peterson, Escondido, Cal., Canada

"Am doing Radio and Television Servicing full time. Have been my own boss. I owe my success to NRI."—Charles Stahl, Ft. Belknap, Iowa

"Am with WOC. NRI course can't be beat. No trouble passing my shop Radio-Television license exam."—John W. Parker, Warren, Mississippi

"By the time I graduated I had paid for my course, a car and living expenses. Can service tonight jobs."—B. J. Simpson, Longwood, New Haven, Ohio

AVAILABLE TO VETERANS UNDER G.I. BILL

You Learn by Practicing with Parts I Send

Nothing takes the place of PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE. That's why NRI training is based on LEARNING BY DOING. You get parts I furnish to build many circuits common to Radio and Television. As part of my Communications Course you build many things, including low power transmitter shown at left. You put it "on the air," perform procedures required of servicing operations. With my Servicing Course you build modern Radio sets. The Multiplier you build to make money fixing sets. Many students make $10, $15 a week even fixing neighbors' sets in spare time while training. Coupon below will bring book showing other equipment you build. It's all yours to keep.

The Tested Way To Better Pay!

Training plus opportunity is the PERFECT COMBINATION for job security, good pay, advancement. In good times, the trained man makes the BETTER PAY. ONCE PROMOTED When jobs are scarce, the trained man enjoys GREATER SECURITY. NRI training can help assure you more of the better things of life.

Start Soon to Make $10, $15
a Week Extra Fixing Sets

Keep your job while training. I start sending you special booklets that show you how to fix sets the day you enroll. Multimeter built with parts I send helps you make $10, $15 a week extra fixing sets while training. Many start their own Radio-Television business with spare time earnings.

My Training Is Up-To-Date

You benefit by my 40 years' experience training men at home. Well Illustrated lessons give you basic principles you need. Realistic developed kits of parts I send (see below) "bring to life" things you learn from lessons.

2 FREE BOOKS
SHOW HOW MAIL COUPON

Television Making Good Jobs, Prosperity—Even without Television, Radio is bigger than ever. $15 million home and auto Radios to be serviced. Over 3000 Radio broadcasting stations use operators, technicians, engineers. Government, Aviation, Police, Ship, Marine-wave Relay, Two-Way Radio Communications for buses, taxis, trucks, etc., are important and growing fields. Television is moving ahead fast.

About 200 Television stations are now on the air. Hundreds of others being built. Good TV jobs opening up for Technicians, Operators, etc.

$5 million homes now have Television sets. Thousands more are being sold every week. Get a job of have your own business selling, installing, servicing.

Radio-TV Needs Men of Action—Mail Coupon

Act now to get more of the good things of life. Actual lesson proves my training is practical, thorough. 66-page book shows good job opportunities for you in many fields. Take NRI training for as little as $5 a month. Many graduates make more than total cost of training in two weeks. Mail coupon now. J. E. SMITH, President, National Radio Institute, Dept. 88, Washington 9, D. C. OUR 40TH YEAR.

Good for Both—FREE

MR. J. E. SMITH, President, Dept. 88
National Radio Institute, Washington 9, D. C.
Mail me Sample Lesson and 66-page Book, FREE.
(No salesman will call. Please write plainly.)

Name Age

Address

City Zone State

VETS write to this of challenges

COMMERCIAL 32

COMMERCIAL 32

created by

CIMMERIAN32

25c

No. 2 APRIL 1956

AN ORIGINAL

EC
PICTO-FICTION
MAGAZINE

Adult Tales of

TERROR

Horror and Suspense

ILLUSTRATED

NOW! Give Yourself a $168-a-Month Raise!

We'll start you in a proven money-earning spare-time business at no cost to you!

SEND FOR FREE BUSINESS KIT!

Here's a business for you that will be as much fun as it is profitable... and you needn't have to invest one cent...ever! We've helped thousands of men succeed in this unique business...and we'd like to do it for you, too. Just 2 orders a day from friends, neighbors, relatives, in "off hours" earns you $168 EXTRA a month! James Kelly of Ohio took so many orders for these Nationally-Advertised shoes that he made $93.55 in just ONE evening! Fred Mages of California regularly makes $5 to $10 every hour he devotes to his Mason Shoe business! There is no limit on what you can earn!

It's easy with our way of selling shoes. We set you up in a complete "shoe store" business you can run from your home. We carry the stock and ship the shoes. All you do is show the styles to your family, friends, people where you work, etc....and take orders. You have a profitable business with no rent, light bill, clerk hire or other costs to worry you. You keep 100% of your profit!

Here's why you'll make money!

- You offer 170 comfortable fast-selling styles... far more than a store!
- You have an amazing range of sizes (2½ to 14) and widths (AAAA to EEEE). Even hard-to-fit people can buy from you!
- Because we carry over 100,000 pairs in stock, your customers get exactly what they want...no misfits or substitutions!
- You feature exclusive Velvet-ees shoes with foamy-soft air-cushion insoles that let you "walk on air." Built for supreme comfort, Mason shoes also feature built-in strong steel shanks, Air-Cushion longitudinal support, Nylon stitching. Advertised in Esquire, Good Housekeeping and on TV, they'll be available only from you...not sold in stores!
- You save your customers money, and the time they would waste "shopping around" shoe stores.

Take Orders For Over 170 Dress-Sport-Work Shoe Styles!

30 kinds of work shoes!
A style for every trade!
Special Neoprene, Cork,
Cushion soles, heels... variegated work shoes...even Safety Toe Shoes!

Smart dress, sport styles!
The last word in styling!
Many fine, unusual leathers
Cord Nylon Mesh styles, moccasins, 2 tones and Cush N-Crope solid shoes!

70 Styles for Women!
Specially chosen every detail!
Many comfort features...
low-heeled, high-heeled, sneakers, service shoes, let-est styles!

No wonder you'll have the biggest and best "shoe store" business in town!

MASON SHOE MFG. CO.
Desk M515 G, Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin

Since 1904

You'll get a Starting Kit FREE!

As soon as we receive the coupon below we'll send you a complete Business Outfit FREE and postpaid! It features the entire Mason Collection in full color; contains 10-second Air Cushion demonstrator, valuable Booklet chock full of how-to-make-money hints, special Measuring Board, advertising reprints...everything else you need to start making cash profits from the first hour! We'll also show you how to earn monthly Bonus Checks and win costly prizes free!

Mason Shoes will be available ONLY from You!

Because Mason Shoes are not sold in stores, you get repeat orders from delighted customers almost automatically! Steady cash profits every month! Since everyone you know wears shoes...EVERYBODY IS A PROSPECT! No wonder this is the perfect "off-hours" business...a quality product everybody needs...backed by the famous Good Housekeeping Guarantee Seal...one you can take orders for 12 months of the year. Want to see how much money you can make? For a 2¢ postcard you can try it NOW...start your exciting business right away!

RUSH THIS STAMP FOR YOUR FREE BUSINESS OUTFIT!

Mr. Ned Mason, Vice President
Mason Shoe Mfg. Co., Desk M515 G
Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin

Yes, I'd like to give myself a $168 a month raise! Please set me up as your man in my community by sending my Complete Starting Shoe Business Outfit FREE and postpaid so I can start making extra money from my first hour!

Name.....
Address.....
Town.....State.....

TERROR

ILLUSTRATED

No. 2 APRIL 1956

IN THIS ISSUE

Cover by Reed Crandall

HORROR IN THE FREAK TENT.....	Al Feldstein 3
REQUIEM.....	John Lerner 15
MOTHER LOVE.....	Maxwell Williams 25
HEAD MAN.....	Jack Oleck 35
REFLECTION OF DEATH.....	Alfred E. Neuman 45

Illustrated by Reed Crandall

Illustrated by Graham Ingels

Illustrated by Charles Sultan

Illustrated by Jack Davis

Illustrated by George Evans

This is the second issue of "Adult Tales of TERROR Illustrated", one of a series of four new magazines to be presented in the novel and revolutionary form of adult entertainment which we at E. C. call "Picto-Fiction". The others are: "CRIME Illustrated", "CONFESSIONS Illustrated" and "SHOCK Illustrated".

At this writing, letters on TERROR's first issue are just beginning to come in. Here are some excerpts:

... I enjoyed your new E. C. terror magazine very much, and especially liked the "Picto-Fiction" style of story-telling. The magazine was excellent for a first issue, and will probably increase in quality with each succeeding one. Best of luck.—Jerry McHone, Asheville, N. C.

... To put it mildly, I was more than pleased with the first issue. All in all, you have a great idea in your new medium, "Picto-Fiction". Keep up the high quality, and lots of luck.—Jack Pross, Detroit, Mich.

We plan a Readers' Letter Page in the next issue of TERROR Illustrated. We welcome your letters. Write to:

The Editors—TERROR Illustrated
Room 706, Dept. 2
225 Lafayette Street
New York 12, N. Y.

PUBLISHER

william m. gains

EDITOR

albert b. feldstein

PRODUCTION

ric doonan

BUSINESS MGR.

lyle stuart

SUBSCRIPTIONS

gloria orlando

Terror Illustrated, Spring, Vol. 1, No. 2. Published Quarterly by E. C. Publishing Co., Inc. at 225 Lafayette Street, New York 12, N. Y. Application for second-class matter pending at the Post Office, New York, N. Y. Subscriptions, 12 issues for $3.00 in the U. S., elsewhere, $3.75. Entire contents Copyrighted 1956 by E. C. Publishing Co., Inc. Unsolicited manuscripts will not be returned unless accompanied by stamped return envelope. No similarity between any of the characters and names of persons appearing in this magazine and those living or dead is intended, and any such similarity is purely coincidental. Printed in the U.S.A.

HORROR IN THE FREAK TENT

My name is Henry Hastings. Once upon a time I was the manager of one of those two-bit carnivals that hits your town every now and then. You know the kind: amusement rides, acrobats, chiseling games, girly shows, pickpockets.

Like I say, once upon a time I managed one of those sucker traps. But I don't any more. I quit my job and I left the carnival racket, and I wouldn't go back for all the money in the world.

Most people, when they think of carnivals, think of calliope music, and ferris wheels, and pink cotton candy. And it makes them feel happy. It makes them think of all the fun they've ever had.

Me, I got sick to my stomach!

Because when I hear calliope music, or see a ferris wheel, or some grimy-faced kid eating pink cotton candy . . . when I even think about those things . . . I start remembering the carny I managed, and the special attraction it had. We were all pretty proud of it. It was the only carny on the circuit with a Freak Show. "Zolotow's Freaks" it was called. And it really pulled in the people.

R. CRANDALL

The owner of the freak concession was a short, dumpy-looking character named Lewis Zolotow. Everybody in the carnny called him "Loocy." Except his freaks, that is. They were taught to have more respect. Loocy considered the freaks beneath him, and treated them accordingly. He was "Mister Zolotow" to them.

Out front, on the midway, you'd think Loocy was the grandest guy in the world. I remember I used to walk over often, just to hear his pitch. He was one great showman.

Loocy seemed to take sadistic delight in torturing the people who worked for him. And none were spared his abuse.

"What's the matter?" he'd snarl at Xetal, the Indian Rubber Man, grabbing his arm and twisting it viciously. "Don't you like your job? I caught your act tonight. Stretch it! Stretch it more!"

But Loocy was just that. A showman. The whole thing was an act with him. Out front, he was all smiles. Big-hearted. Considerate of the freaks he brought out to tease the customers into seeing more.

But backstage, he was a rat. He treated the freaks like dirt. And they despised him. But they were helpless. He was the boss, and to cross him meant they'd be out of a job.

"Smile at the people," he'd scream at Fanny, the Fat Lady. "Don't just sit there, you overgrown cow! Earn your keep!"

And there was Corpus, the Armless and Legless Boy. Corpus had been born without limbs and was quite helpless. Zolotow was particularly mean to him. Especially at the chow table.

"I told you a thousand times, Fanny," Loocy would shriek, "don't feed him! Put the plate down in front of him! Let him eat by himself!"

Poor Corpus would be forced to eat like a dog, and Zolotow would roar with glee, while the other freaks would watch with tears in their eyes.

"Corpus," he'd laugh. "If you had whiskers . . . I'd call you 'Fido'!"

The Freak Show concession owner never passed up an opportunity to inflict severe physical and mental agony upon his employees. His perverted sense of humor kept him well-supplied with ingenious methods. One night, he drew Ricardi aside as he was rehearsing his act.

"How are you and Marja getting along lately, Ricardi?" Looney whispered out of the side of his mouth.

"What do you mean, Mr. Zolotow?" Ricardi studied him.

Ricardi was the sharp-eyed Knife Thrower. His act consisted of hurling knives, ice-picks, cleavers, and the like at his lovely young wife who stood spread-eagled against a board about twenty feet away. Ricardi was sensational.

"I just thought you ought to know, that's all," Looney nodded toward Marja. "I don't like to see anybody being made a fool of!"

"It's your wife, Ricardi!" Looney puffed on his cigar. "I happen to know she's two-timing you! She's been seeing a concession owner on the sly! I won't tell you who, because . . ."

"You're lying!" Ricardi shouted. "I don't believe it!"

"Okay," Looney shrugged. "That's your prerogative! Only . . . I'd keep my eye on her if I were you."

Of course, Zolotow'd lied. But, still, he'd successfully instilled that little spark of doubt and jealousy into Ricardi's mind which glowed brighter and brighter until it caused his hand to tremble ever so slightly when he went into his act.

"Remember what I told you, Marja," Zolotow cowered behind the board during the next performance. "If the knives come close, it's because Ricardi wants to get rid of you! There's a little dancer down the midway he's been seeing!"

"No! You're joking, Mr. Zolotow! Tell me you're joking. Ricardi wouldn't . . ." Marja whimpered.

"It would be so easy," Zolotow went on. "An accident. Who would know? And then he and that little dancing girl . . . Well, I'd watch those knives if I were you, Marja! Before it's too late!"

I'm telling you this, all of it, because I want you to know exactly what kind of a man Looney Zolotow was. I want you to know just why the freaks hated him so. So that you'll understand.

The little joke he'd played on the Ricardis had its effect. At the next afternoon's performance, Ricardi's infallible aim had vanished. The first knife he hurled nicked Marja's arm. She ran from the stage, sobbing.

Marja left the carnj that night. And Ricardi came to Zolotow, his eyes red from crying.

"It's your fault!" he whined. "You broke me up! With those lies about her!"

"Watch yourself, Ricardi," Zolotow hissed, "or you'll be looking for a new carnj! Get wise! She left you because she was scared! She figured you were on to her, and those knives were getting too close for comfort! Forget her!"

Ricardi broke down. He sobbed softly. "What'll I do?" He shook his head sadly. "What'll I do?"

"Don't worry, Ricardi!" Zolotow grinned. "I know where I can find a new partner for you for your act. I've got just the girl in mind. She's a little dancing girl... down the midway..."

Marja came back to the carnival the last night before it was scheduled to move on. Maybe she wanted to make up, I don't know. I saw her in the crowd and was at her side when Ricardi went into his act. Marja watched with tears in her eyes.

"The little dancing girl..." she whispered to no one in particular. "... from down the midway! Then... it's true! It's all... true!"

She turned, sobbing, and pushed through the crowd.

There was nothing I could do. Zolotow's little joke had now been carried to its extreme. Marja left the carnival grounds crying, and never came back. And even I began to dislike the evil Freak Show owner.

Then, one evening, Ricardi invited me to the Freak Show's chow table.

"It was good of you to come, Mr. Hastings," Ricardi smiled.

"It was good of you to ask me, Ricardi. I..."

"FANNY!" Zolotow's snarl interrupted me.

Fanny, the Fat Lady, froze, the spoon in her hand. Corpus, the Armless and Legless Boy, paled, wide-eyed. Zolotow's face turned livid.

"How many times have I told you not to feed Corpus?" he screamed. "How many times have I told you to let him eat by himself?"

"But, Mr. Zolotow," Fanny stammered. "He... he can't eat by himself! Not unless he eats like an... an animal! And he's not an animal! He's..."

"He'll feed himself!" Zolotow's voice quavered. "Or perhaps you'd like to feed him while you're both looking for jobs!"

"I'm sorry, Corpus," Fanny turned to him with a helpless expression.

"I understand, Fanny. It's all right," said Corpus.

An uncomfortable silence fell over the table. I had suddenly lost my appetite. I was horrified at Zolotow's inhumanity.

The rest of the freaks continued to eat, but Corpus just sat there, head bowed, eyeing his food.

Zolotow leaped to his feet. "Feed yourself, Corpus," he snarled. "Like this!" And he pushed the poor boy's face into the plate.

Suddenly, Ricardi moved. His hand shot to his pocket as he rose, and he whipped out a knife. The blade flashed open with a resounding click.

"Leave him alone, Zolotow," he cried.

Looney spun around and his face went white.

"Put down that knife, Ricardi," he hissed.

"Don't you ever torment that boy again, or I will put down this knife, Zolotow," Ricardi whispered, his voice shaking. "... Right through your ugly skull!"

I was dumbstruck . . . frozen with horror . . . powerless to move as I watched the ensuing scene. Looney flushed beet-red. His eyes blazed. He had been made a fool of in front of his entire troupe. He wouldn't stand for that. Not Looney Zolotow.

He rushed to the corner of the tent and scooped up two irons that the Fire-Eater had been heating for the evening performance. They were white-hot.

"Threaten me with a knife, will you?" he growled. "I'll teach you!"

It was all over before I could do anything to stop it. Zolotow rushed at Ricardi as the freaks and I watched, paralyzed with horror, and rammed the white hot irons into his face . . . his eyes.

Ricardi's screams of agony echoed up and down the evening midway.

"You crazy fool!" I managed to finally choke out.

"You've . . . blinded him!"

"He had it coming," gasped Zolotow, staring down at the writhing knife-thrower.

Ricardi lay on the tanhark floor of the tent, his face cupped in his arms, shrieking. The smell of burned flesh filled the air. I felt a sudden wave of nausea sweep over me, and I stumbled toward the entrance, seeking a breath of fresh air.

"Somebody get a doctor," Fanny was sobbing.

"Somebody get a doctor!"

In a little while, the carnival grounds rang with the sound of police and ambulance sirens. The white-coated interns came and took Ricardi away, and the police questioned Zolotow and the freaks.

Zolotow pleaded self-defense. Ricardi had poked a knife on him and he'd protected himself. He was sorry that he'd blinded him, but . . .

The freaks, of course, were too terrorized to say anything to the contrary. They corroborated Zolotow's story.

Ricardi was sent to the local hospital, and when he was released, his case was dismissed for lack of evidence. The carnival had moved on, and Zolotow had not appeared to press charges.

Can you imagine? Ricardi . . . begging Zolotow's forgiveness? It made me sick. And it was all I could do to keep from tearing the fat Freak Show owner apart when I heard him answer Ricardi:

"Get out! Get out, Ricardi! You're through! Washed up! Finished! You can't do an act . . . blind! Get out and don't come back!"

After his release, Ricardi followed the carnival route until he caught up with it.

He came down the deserted midway one night, tapping a new white cane ahead of him, his eyes swathed in bandages. He came looking for Looey Zolotow.

"I need work, Looey," he whined. "I'm sorry about everything! Really I am! Give me a job, Looey! Please?"

He stood there with his blind eyes and begged forgiveness.

But I wasn't the only one who was steamed. I saw the faces of the freaks that had gathered around. I saw the looks in their eyes, and I knew what was going through their minds as they watched Ricardi turn and make his way slowly back down the midway.

I knew that their hearts went out to the poor blind knife-thrower as mine did.

It was a week later that I went to Fanny, the Fat Lady's tent to ask if she'd heard anything from Ricardi since that night he'd come back to the carnival. As I pulled back the flap, a figure melted into the shadows. But one look at the white of the bandage over his eyes was enough.

"Ricardi," I gasped. "What are you doing here?"

"Who . . . who is it?" Ricardi hissed.

"It's me, Ricardi! Mr. Hastings! What are you doing here in Fanny's tent?"

"Hiding, Mr. Hastings," Ricardi edged out of the shadows. "Fanny and Xetal and Corpus and the rest are taking care of me!"

"That's good of them, Ricardi," I said.

"Yes," he went on. "They bring me food . . . and they hide me from Mr. Zolotow!"

"But, Ricardi," I reasoned. "You can't go on like this forever . . ."

"I know, Mr. Hastings. And we're working on that!"

"Working on what, Ricardi?"

"An act, Mr. Hastings! Fanny and Corpus and Xetal! They're teaching me! It's easy! Easier than I thought . . ."

"They're teaching you an act?" I couldn't believe it. "What kind of an act, Ricardi?"

"Why, throwing knives again!" Ricardi grinned eagerly. "It's easy! They just face me toward the board . . . and I try to visualize my partner!"

"Partner?"

"Oh, of course, we're only using a dummy, now! But when I get real good, then . . . maybe . . ."

Ricardi was like a little boy again. He bubbled and chattered about his new act and what a sensation it would be when he perfected it. He took me by the hand and led me out behind Fanny's tent to where a board with a stuffed dummy had been set up. And he made me face him toward it, while he threw a few knives.

He missed the board completely. Every time.

As I made my way back to my tent, I felt like I wanted to cry. The freaks had done wonders with Ricardi. He bore no malice. He wanted only to work again. And he had such confidence in himself.

"I wonder if it could be possible?" I whispered into the midway wind. "If Ricardi could go on again? Throwing his knives. Blind?"

But it did not dampen his eagerness. "I'll learn, Mr. Hastings," he grinned. "I'll learn! You'll see! So, promise me you won't tell Mr. Zolotow about it, Mr. Hastings! At least not until I'm ready to show it to him! Then, maybe he might forgive me . . . and take me back . . ."

I did not see Ricardi again until one afternoon about a month later. The freaks had kept him well-hidden. He stumbled into my office, his face beaming. The bandages were gone.

"Tonight, Mr. Hastings! I'm going to perform tonight! Fanny told me Mr. Zolotow would see my act tonight! You come too! Please!"

"I'll be there, Ricardi," I said. "I wouldn't miss this for anything!"

And I meant what I said. That night, I made my way to the Freak Tent. The audition had already started when I entered, for I heard the sounds of gay laughter and hearty applause.

"Good shot, Ricardi," Fanny squealed. "Bravo," cried Xetal.

I watched, fascinated. I had come in behind the backboard and I could see their faces. The freaks. They were smiling. Laughing. It had been so long since I'd seen any of them smile.

"A little higher this time, Ricardi," Corpus instructed.

"Use an ice pick this time, Ricardi," said the Fire-Eater.

Ricardi was smiling too, although it was a blank smile. A face without eyes lacks so much expression.

Ricardi threw the ice pick. It made a dull thud as it hit. A cheer went up and the freaks applauded enthusiastically.

"Good, Ricardi," giggled Fanny. "Good!"

"Another, Ricardi! Another ice pick!" said the Fire-Eater and handed it to him.

"This time try to get it a little higher and to the right, Ricardi," Corpus instructed.

The second ice-pick was thrown. It, too, must have hit true, for the freaks roared with delight. Their applause echoed back and forth in the huge, empty Freak Tent. Although I could not see from my vantage point how accurate Ricardi was, I applauded too, from sheer joy at seeing all of them so happy.

"Someone's there . . . behind the board," gasped the Bearded Lady.

"Is that you, Mr. Hastings?" called Ricardi.

"Yes, Ricardi. It's me!"

"I'm showing Mr. Zolotow my act, Mr. Hastings. Can you see well?"

"Well enough, Ricardi. Go ahead."

I did not want to move. I had not seen such happiness among the freaks for so long. I wanted to stay where I could see their faces. There's where the real show was. Not the board.

"Now the cleaver," shrieked Corpus.

"Yes, the cleaver," howled Fanny.

I looked for Looey Zolotow. I wanted to see his expression. I knew he would go for this act. But he wasn't down in front.

"Where's Looey, Ricardi?" I asked.

"He's watching, isn't he?" Ricardi grinned.

"Sure, Ricardi! Sure he's watching," said Fanny, handing him the cleaver.

The cleaver landed with a dull thud. And suddenly, my blood ran cold. I heard an unmistakable groan. I looked down.

There was a pool of blood at the base of the backboard!

A nausea swept over me.

The freaks had gagged and tied Looey Zolotow to the board. And Ricardi's aim had been horribly bad... or good, as the case may be. He'd rarely missed! The freaks had guided him well!

"Sure, he's watching," giggled Fanny. "Now, one more cleaver and your act will be over, Ricardi!"

"Lord have mercy on them," I whispered as I stumbled away.

THE END

REQUIEM

Mr. Jeremy was quite spent. He had been rather short of breath of late, and so he leaned upon his shovel and watched while Parks dug on, his slight, neatly-clad body and fine, sensitive face in such marked contrast with Parks's heavy muscles and flat features.

The cemetery was dark and very still, so that the sounds of Parks's shovel made a soft chush-chush-chush, easily audible. Mr. Jeremy liked the sound.

He liked to think of it as a sort of requiem; a sort of final contact between the living and the dead. Mr. Stevens, the undertaker, thought that he was the last link between Masonville's citizens and those they buried, but Mr. Stevens was wrong! And a lot Mr. Jeremy could tell the whole town about Mr. Stevens! About cheap shrouds substituted for expensive ones, about corpses carelessly tossed into their caskets!

But of course, Mr. Jeremy never would tell the town. How could he? Then they would know that he was a grave robber!

Though Mr. Jeremy was a grave robber, he was a sensitive man, not at all brutalized by his calling. Did he not hum a little tune silently in his head, even now?

Heigh-ho, it is a dreary business, a dreary business by far . . .

But the dead are dead, and the living must live, and that's the way things are . . .

But Parks had uncovered the casket now . . . the casket buried only this afternoon with such tears and lamentations.

Time was of the essence in Mr. Jeremy's profession. A grave, newly dug, could be opened and re-closed with no one the wiser. While a grave left untouched for some time might be overgrown with weeds or covered with vines tenderly planted. To replace the sod upon such a grave was a delicate task, most time-consuming.

Mr. Jeremy shuddered. Parks was such an unfeeling brute. He had pried open the lid of the casket with his spade, and Mr. Jeremy distinctly heard the small snapping noise.

Old Mrs. Price, in the coffin, had had brittle bones and Parks had no doubt experienced difficulty in removing the big, old-fashioned amethyst ring from her rigid finger.

Amethysts brought small prices these days, but the ring together with the diamond ear-bobs in her pierced ears would make the evening worth while.

Definitely a depressing business. But . . . Heigh-ho, the living must live . . .

"Ugly old biddy, wasn't she?" muttered Parks.

Ugly? Ah, me! Mr. Jeremy sighed. He could remember Mrs. Price when she was young and soft and all the bachelors in Masonville courted her. So prim . . . so dignified. But where was her dignity now, with Parks straddling her coffin and grinning at her in the darkness?

Mr. Jeremy was about to chide Parks, but he was still short of breath. And Parks was not one to be abashed by words concerning the dignity of the dead. Parks was sexton of the cemetery, and callous.

Had it really been almost twenty years since Mr. Jeremy had found Parks in his cups one night and delicately broached the subject of opening graves for a profit?

But . . . yes, it had been. Almost twenty years! Mr. Jeremy's heaving lungs and white locks and those confounded toothaches attested to that. Ah, well . . .

"Finish up," said Mr. Jeremy, turning to leave.

"My money first," said Parks.

"After I sell the stones!"

So petty. So mercenary. The clod! Mr. Jeremy detested Parks.

Mr. Jeremy went home, washed carefully, and went to bed, exhausted.

He would have to take better care of himself. Really he would. There was this breathlessness of late, and that annoying tooth he had meant to have attended . . .

The dentist was kind in the morning. Everyone was kind to Mr. Jeremy, as people always are kind to elders who smile and are gentle and pat the heads of playing children as they pass.

"This filling will have to be replaced," said the dentist. "And this one. And this. I'm afraid it will be rather expensive, but . . . we'll work something out."

Oh, my, yes, the dentist was very kind. It was common knowledge that Mr. Jeremy lived on a small pension. But Mr. Jeremy smiled and ordered the best. After all, the dentist would be paying for it himself, in a way.

It had only been some six months since Mr. Jeremy had unearthed the body of the dentist's ten year old daughter . . . dead of pneumonia, poor little thing . . . and removed from her wasted neck her deceased mother's emerald brooch, sentimentally interred with her by her father . . .

But . . . heigh-ho . . .

Afterwards, Mr. Jeremy walked the sunlit streets of Masonville and watched the children playing. It was such a pleasant afternoon. It seemed a shame to spoil it with business. But one must be practical. Toward evening, he strolled past the funeral parlor and stopped to chat with Mr. Stevens. Any deaths today?

Mr. Stevens shook his head. No luck there. Mr. Jeremy strolled on. And suddenly, he gasped at the fire in his chest. Suddenly he leaned for support against the trunk of an old elm, fighting the nausea which overwhelmed him.

It was his heart, of course. After he had come to himself a bit, Mr. Jeremy went directly to Doctor Blaine's. Poor Doctor Blaine! The funeral wreath was still on the door, though his dear wife had been gone for almost a month now.

The Blaines had been such a devoted couple. Mr. Jeremy had actually regretted the necessity when he and Parks had dug up her corpse and removed her diamond wedding band . . . the one the doctor had given her on their twenty-fifth anniversary. Many a pleasant evening Mr. Jeremy had spent in her house. But . . . Heigh-ho . . .

The doctor shook his head. "I won't lie to you, Jeremy," he said. "It's bad. A leaky heart valve. You can live for quite a while . . . or you can go tomorrow. All I can advise is that you live moderately. And you already do that. I'm sorry."

Doctor Blaine gave Mr. Jeremy a small vial of pills. "To be taken in case of any sudden nausea or pain," he instructed.

But the verdict was apparent. Mr. Jeremy had little time left. And so, he began to think.

Mr. Jeremy was a clever man. But he had never thought along these lines before. Death had always been close, but never a personal thing to him. It was different now. When Parks came to him the next day with the news, he shook his head.

"No, you say?" Oh, Parks was a surly, greedy hulk. "Maybe you didn't understand me! I said old man Price is dead!"

"He's laid out in Stevens's place right now. I talked to Stevens," Parks's eyes gleamed, "and he's being buried with his diamond ring and that platinum watch the clerks at his bank gave him!"

"I heard you!" Mr. Jeremy attempted a stratagem. "But . . . well, listen, Parks. Price was a friend of mine. An old friend. Perhaps, just this once, it would be just as well to permit the corpse to rest in peace . . ."

"Friend? Friend?" Suddenly Parks was laughing. Roaring. "You!? Talking about friends!"

Then, just as suddenly, Parks was no longer laughing. "You old hypocrite! You want him all for yourself, don't you? Friends! Hah! You'd steal the pennies off your dead mother's eyes! And so would I! We're two of a kind! We share and share alike!"

In the end, Mr. Jeremy tried to tell Parks about his heart. But of course Parks didn't believe it. So Mr. Jeremy had to promise to be at the cemetery that night. And after he'd gone, Parks's words lingered in Mr. Jeremy's head.

"And so would I! We're two of a kind!"

Mr. Jeremy shook himself. The indignity of it! To die . . . to be laid to rest . . . and then to be dug up and stripped of whatever valuables loved ones had seen fit to inter with you! An unpleasant prospect! Why, the man had no conscience!

No conscience at all, Mr. Jeremy learned that night. Parks was waiting when he arrived. Together, they went to where the freshly turned earth lay heaped in a new grave mound. Together, they dug . . . until the rich casket was exposed. Price had been a wealthy man; the town banker. A man respected. A man treated with awe by the people of Massville. But there was little that was awesome about Mr. Price now. And Parks was annoyed with Mr. Jeremy.

After he had taken the ring and the platinum watch, Parks bent one of Price's stiff arms double, thumb to nose . . .

"No! Don't!" Mr. Jeremy was shocked.

"Don't?" Parks's voice was soft, but threatening. Definitely threatening. As if, after all these years of taking orders from Mr. Jeremy, the worm had finally turned. As if he were demonstrating a point to Mr. Jeremy. "Why not? Him and his airs! I don't like people who take on airs . . . who think they're better than other people!"

"Meaning me?" said Mr. Jeremy.

Parks shrugged. "If the shoe fits, wear it! Just remember! We're partners!"

Mr. Jeremy felt ill. Partners, yes . . . now! But what about after? Mr. Jeremy could picture himself buried . . . and Parks's spade biting through the earth, prying up the lid of his coffin . . .

"Better buy a couple of new spades tomorrow," Parks snapped. "Long-handled! I'm sick of digging with these. They break your back!"

"You're not going to leave him like that?" cried Mr. Jeremy.

"Just like that!" Parks's laugh was coarse, vulgar. "Maybe you can go soft about a 'friend'! Me, I'm different!"

Oh, yes, Parks was different. Mr. Jeremy took a pill. All at once there was a nausea within him. But the pill did little good. He was still sick in the morning. Quite sick.

It took all of Dr. Blaine's ministrings to bring Mr. Jeremy around. He worked hard, trying this, trying that, trying to keep the breath of life in Mr. Jeremy's body. And all the while, Mr. Jeremy's eyes were upon the black mourning band sewn 'round the doctor's sleeve.

Not that Mr. Jeremy felt any twinges of remorse. One does not feel remorse concerning something which has become a way of life. Mr. Jeremy was only remembering: When he and Parks had opened the coffin in which the doctor's wife lay, Parks had become impatient in his efforts to remove the wedding band from her stiff finger. He'd raised his spade and brought it, slashing, down.

Parks! Parks! Parks! Mr. Jeremy could think of nothing else. Parks . . . opening his grave! Parks . . . doing unspeakable things to him!

The doctor was astonished when Mr. Jeremy recovered . . . or seemed to. But then, he knew nothing of the indestructible will which lifted Mr. Jeremy from his sickbed. The doctor, poor man, mentally congratulated himself on having performed a new miracle.

Mr. Jeremy had things to do. Painfully, slowly, so as not to place any undo strain in his rapidly beating heart, Mr. Jeremy donned his dignified clothing one morning and set out.

Stevens, the undertaker, greeted him warmly. But Mr. Jeremy was not visiting for the sake of exchanging small talk. He came directly to the point. He'd come to arrange a funeral.

"After all," he said, smiling wanly, "I'm not getting any younger."

Mr. Jeremy haggled. Not from lack of funds, but because of Parks. The casket he choose was of pine. The least expensive in Stevens's stock. No satin cushions. No bronze handles. Nothing, in a word, worth the effort it would cost Parks to disinter him. Mr. Jeremy intended to make certain.

Later, he visited his attorney. Mr. Jeremy had never considered a will to be essential. He had neither kith nor kin to mourn his passing. But a will seemed quite essential now.

"I am to be buried in my cheapest, most worn clothes," he instructed. "No jewelry, nothing of value."

Before nightfall, the town was already mourning Mr. Jeremy's passing, though the man still lived. If a man is so certain of death, those who surround him are not apt to question. And all knew of Mr. Jeremy's visits to the doctor . . . the doctor's visits to him.

Still, Mr. Jeremy did not die. Mr. Jeremy went on living. Nor did he neglect himself. Had not the doctor said he might live for years? Mr. Jeremy went on with his visits to the dentist . . . with his tender care of his aged carcass.

It was after one of his visits to the dentist that he met Parks. Parks grinned and said, "I heard about the will and the coffin. Getting ready? Playing it safe, aren't you?"

"Safe?" Mr. Jeremy acted innocent.

"Cheap coffin, no jewelry . . ." Parks had guessed. Parks was shrewd, as rats are sometimes shrewd. And amused. There was no point in Mr. Jeremy trying to deceive him.

"I've been making sure," said Mr. Jeremy, "that when I die, I'll be left alone. You wouldn't be fool enough to dig up a corpse without hope of profit."

"Sure, sure." Parks's smile was somehow lascivious. "But speaking of profit, I just came by the Willoughby house. I talked to Doc Blaine. The Willoughby kid probably won't last the day!"

"No!" This time, Mr. Jeremy's voice was almost a shriek. Not that he cared a fig about the Willoughby girl. He dared not exert himself. It might be fatal.

"When it happens, I'll let you know. And when I do, you come!" Parks's voice was caressing. "Willoughby has money!"

"You know as well as I do that the string of pearls he gave the kid for her sixteenth birthday is worth a pile. That he's not likely to bury her without them. And you never bought those long-handled spades. Bring 'em along."

"No!"

Parks shook his head. "Stubborn, aren't you? You come! Maybe you're fixin' to die . . . maybe not. But either way, we share! If we don't . . . well, it's only a little way from diggin' up a corpse to makin' one!"

Mr. Jeremy knew that Parks would not hesitate to kill, and that he still did not understand. Parks still suspected that Mr. Jeremy was somehow trying to cheat him. So there was really no way out. Mr. Jeremy purchased the new spades that afternoon.

And the Willoughby girl died the next morning. Mr. Jeremy attended the funeral. A pitiful sight, with the girl's parents weeping bitterly. Mr. Jeremy was most consoling.

But being a practical man, Mr. Jeremy did not attempt to find an escape for himself. There was none. So . . . Heigh-ho, it is a dreary business . . .

He presented himself at the cemetery gate-house that night with the two new spades, and he and Parks dug by the light of the moon. But, dig slowly as he might, the work was hard for Mr. Jeremy. Long before the new casket had been uncovered, he was breathing heavily and there was a dull ache in his side.

He was hardly interested when Parks opened the coffin and found the pearls, gleaming white against the more intense whiteness of the corpse's throat. Mr. Jeremy had dangled the Willoughby girl upon his knee in years gone by, but what did that matter now?

. . . The dead are dead and the living must live . . .

Only, Mr. Jeremy was dying. He fell to one knee on the fresh earth, clutching his heart.

Parks looked up startled, and read the truth in Mr. Jeremy's pallid face. He worked swiftly after that, closing up the grave. Then he took Mr. Jeremy by the arm and half-led, half-dragged him away. It would never do to have Mr. Jeremy found in the cemetery.

At the door to his house, Mr. Jeremy rallied for a moment. He looked around for Parks and saw him, dimly, through a mist. Parks was staring at him.

"You really meant it," he said stupidly. "You really are sick!"

"I'm . . . already dead," gasped Mr. Jeremy. "But my dying . . . won't mean profit to you. Remember! There won't be . . . anything in my coffin! Only . . . me . . ."

Parks said nothing. Only Mr. Jeremy thought he saw him smile. Then the night spun crazily and Mr. Jeremy fell. But, dying, he was content. They would take him to the cemetery quietly, in dignity, and in dignity, place him below the sod. And he would rest, undisturbed. He'd made certain . . .

... The dead are dead ...

And Mr. Jeremy was quite right. Masonville hurried him quietly, with dignity. He smiled in his coffin under the earth, at rest.

Until the sound of metal on wood heralded the approach of something living. And after a while, a new, long-handled spade ripped the pine lid from Mr. Jeremy's simple casket and Parks stood grinning down at Mr. Jeremy's smile.

Mr. Jeremy had overlooked something.

From his pocket, Parks took a pair of heavy pliers, and bent, humming to his work.

There was quite a large amount of gold in those new fillings the dentist had put in Mr. Jeremy's teeth.

Heigh ho . . .

THE END

Mother Love

Just ahead, at the end of the dimly lit corridor, was the door she had been seeking. Leona whimpered a little. Not from fear or agony this time, but from tenderness . . . eagerness. Beyond that door was her baby. The baby they had taken from her only moments after she had born it. The baby which was the doll she'd never owned. Something truly her own at last, upon which to lavish all the love and tenderness so long locked up within her.

Yet Leona did not rush blindly to the door. Somewhere she had found a nurse's cloak a dozen sizes too large for her small, undernourished body. She made a crouching, furtive blob as she moved, but she was not aware of that. She tip-toed slowly, every sense . . . the sharp, overdeveloped senses which Nature sometimes bestows upon the insane . . . alert. The hospital was small, and at this hour there was little likelihood of someone chancing by. But it was possible. So she crept slowly to the door beyond which was her baby . . .

She stood for a long time in the room, staring at her baby through the tears that filled her eyes. It was so small, so pink and white. When she picked it up, when she held it tight against her breast beneath the voluminous cloak, it seemed to her that her heart would burst. The wordless crooning that came softly from her lips was ageless, infinite.

But then there was no more time for tenderness. The hospital would be stirring soon. She found the front door and stepped into the small town street.

That way! Leona remembered. When Clint had brought her, moaning and writhing in her agony, he had driven his splintered wagon up the street from the south. That meant the swamp lay that way.

Leona was a shadow, flitting down the deserted sidewalks, hugging her baby.

A mile down the highway which led out of town, there was a dirt road that turned off into the trees. That was where Clint had stopped the wagon to curse at her, to tell her to stop her eternal wailing. She remembered. That was where he'd struck her one final blow, his calloused fingers slamming against her mouth, cutting off her moan of pain. She could remember so little. Yet, somehow, through the haze, she could remember everything that Clint had done to her. Everything!

The dirt road turned wet, and became mud. Ahead was the great swamp. The road vanished, after a while, and Leona did not know the safe trails.

Leeches clung to her legs, fattened on her blood, and dropped off. Muddy, brackish water, sometimes hip deep, stained her stolen dress. Vines and creepers ripped and scratched her. But these things were old acquaintances to Leona. She had been born in the swamp. She went on, cradling her baby beneath the protecting cloak.

Many times during the night, she stopped to look at her baby, to watch its tiny arms move, to croon senseless words of endearment to it. But always, that other urge, that other drive was there. By morning, she was standing beside the gnarled sycamore, whose tormented roots thrust themselves up out of the spongy ground not fifty yards from the cabin she had shared with Clint for so long.

Now she became cautious. No smoke poured from the mud chimney of the cabin. Nothing moved. She walked softly, carefully. It would not do to have Clint know that she was there . . . that she had returned. Not until she was ready. She wanted to surprise him, to see his face when he saw their baby for the first time. That was important.

But the cabin was empty. Clint wasn't there. He was probably out in the swamp, trapping. Leona slipped out of the filthy cloak. Then she sat, rocking, holding her child in her arms, waiting. Remembering.

Yes, she could remember everything about Clint, right from that very first day. The day Clint and her father had gotten drunk together . . .

"Leona! Get out here and kiss your bridegroom!" her father had snarled in his drunken stupor. And that was how she'd met Clint.

Dumbly, obediently, she'd risen from the ragged blankets that served as her bed and came out of her father's cabin into the damp swamp night air. The words had meant nothing to her then. But to disobey meant a beating. So she'd stood, a moment later, not comprehending, while the big man with the thick-featured unshaven face walked around her, his bleary eyes traveling over her, grinning.

"She ain't smart, but she cooks good . . . an' she ain't a bad looker, eh, Clint?" Her father had been eager, anxious. "She'll make a good wife!"

"Yeah?" Clint had grinned stupidly. "Le'see..."

He'd reached out to pull her close to his sweating body, to fasten his mouth on hers.

And the reek of cheap whiskey had choked Leona... gagged her.

She'd struggled, and Clint had let her go, still grinning. But with a difference in his grin. With his pale eyes alighted in hungry anticipation.

"Spunky, eh?" he'd hissed. "Well, we'll fix that! Yeah! We'll sure fix that!"

"Twenty dollars ain't so much, Clint!" Her father had held out a half-filled bottle. "Come on, drink up, an' we'll call it a deal, huh?"

"Twenty dollars? For a gal that ain't got no more sense in her head than a three year old?"

"A woman don't need sense in the swamp! All she needs is a strong back!"

It had meant nothing to Leona when they haggled. But in the end, when half a dozen filthy dog-eared greenbacks had changed hands and Clint had started leading her toward his wagon, she'd been afraid. Afraid of this big man who looked at her so strangely. So she'd held back.

And she'd learned that this man was not like her father. Her father's blows were heavy when he rained them on her. They hurt. But this man's hand was a hammer! It snapped her head back on her shoulders, and dropped her, dazed, to the ground with a thin trickle of scarlet running from her lips.

"That'll learn you," he'd snarled, standing over her. "When I say move, you move!"

Leona'd looked toward her father for help, but she'd seen him with the bottle tilted to his lips, the whiskey running down his stubbled chin.

Then a bruising hand was on her arm, pulling her up, dragging her toward a wagon. And she'd gone, because she was alone and helpless.

Somewhere along the way, there was a cabin where for a dollar, a swamp preacher as bearded and filthy as Clint muttered a few words, and Clint's mouth fastened over hers for the second time. Only this time, Leona did not pull away. She could still feel his hammer blow.

"You can learn, anyway, can't you?" Clint had grinned, pleased.

And that part had not been so bad. If was what had come later . . .

The nightmare began in the dirty cabin that was to be Leona's home. The night sounds, the shriek of the hunting hawk, the eternal hum of the insects, all had been counterpoint to Leona's screams when Clint had seized her.

He'd not grinned then. His eyes had been blood-shot and slitted, and he'd muttered:

"You're my wife, now! My wife! Do you understand?"

His fingers had wound themselves in her hair when she'd tried to flee his embrace.

"So you don't like me, eh? That's good!" He'd laughed. An animal laugh. "Well, I don't like things that come too easy, anyhow! Now, you c'mere . . ."

Leona had been sick in the morning. Horribly, agonizingly sick. Hurt. But Clint had been suffering the after-effects of the cheap rotten whiskey he'd consumed the night before. He'd been in no mood to hear her complaints. He'd been rat-mean. His big hands had beaten her almost senseless, so that she'd finally cooked his breakfast, dragging herself . . .

After that, it was as if that first night was a pattern. Leona learned. She learned to avoid the casual kicks, the casual slaps.

But sometimes, they were not casual. Sometimes Clint would seek her out deliberately, as if in tormenting her, he could relieve the brutal squalor which was all he had ever known. As if, in making Leona's life a horror, he could make his own less of a horror.

Not that Leona thought of her life as a horror. Her mind was not capable of that. Leona knew only that there was a lack in the scheme of things.

How could she know that what she yearned for was something to love?

Once, she made a doll out of some rags and string. Because it felt good to hold it in her arms. Clint found her sitting on the bed, cradling it. And he laughed at her.

But when she did not react, when she did not comprehend that he was ridiculing her, he tore the doll from her arms and thrust it into the pot-bellied stove to be consumed, laughing as he watched the tears stream down her face.

It was a month later that he began to look at her queerly. After she'd fainted for the first time, while she was carrying the heavy bucket of water from the well to the cabin. Suddenly, the earth had seemed to spin up to meet her. And when she'd opened her eyes, she'd been dripping wet and Clint had been standing over her, the empty bucket in his hands.

"All right! What ails you?" he'd answered.

Leona had tried to tell him about the nausea, the pains. But her words had been disjointed. Clint had left her lying there.

And it had happened again ... and again ...

One night, his eyes had taken in the slight thickening of her body. And his fist had slammed down on the table in angry realization.

"A baby! That's it!" he'd shouted. "A baby! Now you won't be worth a damn to me!"

Brats were not part of Clint's plans. Before, he had been cruel, brutal. Now, he was a devil. A woman with child was not only ugly; she was useless! And he'd paid hard cash for Leona!

From then on, his blows and kicks were slyly directed, designed to inflict more than one kind of pain. Only Clint went too far. There was a time when Leona did not move from her bed. Despite the blows. A time when she lay rocking back and forth in her agony, day after day, night after night. When even Clint left her alone to suffer the tortures of the damned physically, while her poor hurt brain soared.

A baby! A little thing all her own to love and care for! Leona dreamed through her torments in a half-world that was all softness and love. Soon ... soon ... her child would lie in her arms, against her heart. Soon the emptiness there would be filled. Such warm, sweet thoughts.

Leona did not know that, even as she dreamed, her body writhed. But Clint knew. Knew ... and began to be afraid. Even in the swamp, there was law. If Leona died, there would be questions. There would be those who would want to know ... about the marks ... the bruises.

It was almost Leona's time when he decided upon a course of action. Outside, a storm had left the swamp trails dangerous and treacherous, but it had to be risked.

When Clint hitched the horse to his wagon, he was almost glad that the trails would be dangerous. That way, there would be less chance of meeting another swamper.

Leona moaned softly when he carried her to the wagon and tumbled her into it. Her eyes were closed, hidden by the matted hair which clung to the perspiration on her face. But her eyes did not remain closed. And her moans grew louder, louder . . .

Leona was conscious then. She bit back the moans. No sound came from her as the wagon creaked up the empty streets. She hung limply in Clint's arms when he lifted her, carried her up the steps of the tiny small-town hospital.

Clint's whip was a blur. There was little time. But lashing his horse did no good. The tortured beast slipped in the mud. The wheels sank again and again, so that Clint had to climb down and set his shoulder to them. By the time they reached the highway, Leona's moans were clearly audible.

"Shut up!" he snarled, slapping her hard. "Shut up, blast you! I don't want anybody askin' any questions!"

Clint left her there on the steps, a shadow among other shadows. Let them try to figure it out! His wagon creaked back the way it had come. Leona would not be able to tell them anything. Not incoherent Leona! He was safe!

Now could Leona tell them anything when they found her in the morning. The night had been long and black with pain. What little reason remained to her had gone forever, shattered into a thousand disjointed screaming fragments. Only two thoughts were left in her muddled mind. The baby . . . and Clint. One thought tender, loving . . . the other hard, hateful.

"No!" Leona tried to scream. Her baby! They were taking it away! She tried to struggle, to fight. But the drugs, the sedatives were powerful. They kept her pressed down upon the white sheets, silent and helpless to stop them.

They were kind in the hospital. Gentle hands lifted Leona up, stripped off the rags she wore, bathed her. Gentle voices murmured sympathetically:

"Lord! Did you ever see anything like it?"

"Poor little thing!"

"Why she's only a baby herself!"

"A swamper, from the looks of her!"

After a while, there were bright lights . . . a rolling stretcher . . . a bare room, dazzling in its white cleanliness . . . shiny chrome and steel instruments.

Then there was someone holding the tiny morsel of pink . . . taking it away.

It was later that Leona screamed and would not stop screaming. After they had taken her to her room. It was then that women with broad straps came and forced her back onto the iron bed, and then stood looking down at her, pitilyng, shaking their heads.

They took the straps off, eventually. They came and talked to her... about herself... about her baby. But they did not bring her baby to her. And Leona knew, after a while, that they never would bring her baby to her. And so she waited.

She made no plans. There were just... just two things she had to do. The first, she'd done earlier that night. She'd crept through the silent corridors, she'd taken a dress and a nurse's cloak, and she'd found her baby...

* * * * *

Now, there was the other thing that had to be done.

Somewhere outside, a twig cracked.

Clint!

Gently, Leona placed her baby on the bed. She was waiting behind the door when Clint came into the cabin.

He was drunk again. Reeking. But even he seemed to sense that she was there.

He turned, and Leona moved forward, the kitchen knife she'd taken from the table in her hands. There was no fear in her now. She circled him, warily. And Clint turned with her, stupidly.

"You..." he muttered. "You came back! You were going to have a baby..."

His eyes focused, went past Leona, to the bed. He could see the baby now. His mouth opened... then closed.

It was then that Leona drove the knife into his throat. Clint staggered, gurgling, but she followed. The knife drove home again. Again. And again.

He slipped to the floor and she stood over him, staring down at him, feeling purged and clean and free.

It was a long time before she dropped the knife and went back to her baby on the bed.

Clint was forgotten then. The baby moved restlessly when she picked it up. Only the baby mattered. Leona held it close, content.

The troopers found her so. Two of the men who were part of the dragnet scouring the swamp for her stood in the doorway staring, sickened, at the thing which had been Clint, and at Leona and her baby.

But the doctor and the troopers who stood over Clint's body knew none of that. The doctor turned away, white. "God!" he whispered.

"Pretty messy, eh, Doc?" one of the troopers muttered. "I guess you'd better take the baby back to the hospital. We'll take the woman."

"Yes, I guess so!" The doctor nodded, but his eyes were back on Clint. "God!" he said again. "Poor devil. I wonder what he ever did to deserve winding up like that..."

She fought them when they took her baby away from her. But they had expected that. In the end, one of them held her helpless, while the other went out to the radio on their car.

Leona was quiet when the doctor came from the hospital. As if all her small store of will had been consumed in bringing her this far. She stared across the room at her baby... the only thing she had ever loved...

But there was no answer and it was growing late. The doctor had to get back to the hospital. The trooper led Leona outside and the doctor followed, carrying the baby.

The baby that was a misshapen pink and white horror. The end-product of a thousand blows and kicks. A thing to make strong men wince and turn away, moving restlessly in the jar of formaldehyde into which its grotesquely deformed body had been placed only moments after it had been still-born.

THE END

HEAD MAN

Bruce had been playing with his treasures in the attic. Only a moment before, he had been Captain Kidd, leading his trusty crew aboard a jewel-laden merchantman. But now, quite suddenly, he was nine years old again. He shivered, involuntarily, as his father's loud voice drifted up to him. Most of the town shivered when there was anger in John Emery's voice. And there was anger in it now.

Bruce could see his father below, through the boards of the long attic floor, sitting in the living room ceiling. A big, thickest man who ran the town as he ran his household, with an iron fist. He was pacing back and forth before the town constable, Mr. Simpson, who sat silent in one of the room's fat easy chairs.

"Five!" John Emery was shouting. "Five children dead! Murdered! Five disappointed bodies! And what have you done about it? Nothing! I warn you, Simpson! Find the lunatic who is responsible! And fast..."

"But..." Mr. Simpson stammered.

Bruce felt sorry for the gaunt constable. His father never accepted excuses. Nor would he now. "No buts!" John Emery boomed. "I want results! I put you into your job, Simpson, and I can yank you out of it! This thing is affecting my mill hands! They're scared! They're worried! It's affecting their work!" Emery paused, hulking over the constable. "I don't want to have to identify my son's body! I've seen five headless corpses already! That's enough!"

Bruce shivered again. The grown-ups thought he didn't know about the murders. But he'd heard them whispering.

"Make a set of temporary laws," his father went on. "See to it that no child is allowed out after sundown. Do something! I'll certainly see to it that my own boy stays in the house. I can't depend on you!"

"Yes, Mr. Emery," the constable rose.

He went out, his eyes shadowed, twisting his battered old felt hat in his thin hands.

Bruce returned to his treasures, considering. After all, his father hadn't yet told him he was forbidden to leave the house after sundown. If he went out, it wouldn't be as if he was being disobedient!

With his penknife, he pried up the attic floor-board beneath which he stored his things.

His father would disapprove of the lizard, the slingshot, and the other prized possessions which meant so much to Bruce. His father disapproved of almost everything.

He went out the back way, through the well-kept garden. Grown-ups! Huh! He was Captain Kidd, Richard the Lion-Hearted, Kit Carson! What did he have to fear? But there was something in the air. The town was too quiet, too still. Bruce didn't like it. He was glad when he spied a boy of about his age aimlessly tossing a ball against the wooden side of a mill hand's cottage.

In moments, he had made friends, and was playing a game of catch with the other boy.

It lasted only a little while, though. The afternoon shadows were lengthening and the stillness of the town was becoming thick, oppressive. The other boy's parents emerged from their home and shoosd Bruce's new-found friend indoors.

"You're the Emery boy," said the mother, turning to him. "You'd better run along home, now. Your father . . ."

It was almost dark now. Part of the way home, Bruce skipped. That was when he was on horseback. Part of the way, he walked with an exaggerated rolling gait. That was aboard a schooner in the South Seas. He was only a few blocks from home when he became aware of the shadow behind him.

The shadow was a man. That much he could see in the gloom. But when he stopped, when he waited for the shadow to catch up, the man stopped too.

She bit that off. But Bruce knew. His father didn't like him playing with the children of the mill hands. They weren't good enough for him!

"Not that there's anything wrong with kids of mill hands, Bruce," he would say. "But after all, you're John Emery's son!"

Bruce quickened his pace. The shadow quickened its pace. Bruce slowed. The shadow slowed.

The panic came suddenly. Suddenly, Bruce was running. Whatever it was, whoever it was, it was after him! He ran blindly, wildly, with sudden tears of fright running down his face and into his open, gasping mouth. And the shadow followed.

If only there were someone in the street. But there was no one. No one! He was alone! Alone in the world with that! That thing that hunted him!

But home was just ahead! Run! Run! Through the gate! Up the walk! Through the door! Into the heavy, reassuring presence of his father . . . the comforting embrace of his mother's arms.

"Bruce, where have you been?" His father began a tirade, but was cut short by his mother.

"John, he's terrified!" Her arms closed tighter about him. "Darling, what is it? What happened?"

"Man . . . outside . . . ran . . . after . . . me . . ."
The gasping words were strangled, quavered with fear.

There was a gun in a bureau drawer. Mr. Emery was carrying it when he went outside . . . when he met the constable coming up the walk.

"Evenin', Mr. Emery," said Mr. Simpson. "Bruce got home all right? I spotted him in town and followed him to keep an eye on him, but I guess he got scared an' ran."

"So it was you!" Emery's face was hidden in darkness, but his voice gave away the fact that he did not quite accept, did not quite believe the constable's words. "I see. Yes, he got home all right. Thank you . . . Mr. Simpson."

Bruce had bad dreams that night. But he had the resiliency of youth. He had forgotten the incident by morning. It was only the constable after all. And Bruce liked the constable. He even felt sorry for him. The constable was . . . well . . . sort of a lonely man.

They found the sixth small pitiful corpse four days later, by the creek.

And when Bruce's father railed the constable . . . when the old guy became confused and stammered that he couldn't patrol everywhere, that actually the creek wasn't even inside the town limits . . . Bruce only wanted to be helpful. In a way, he was trying to protect the constable from his father's abuse when he said,

"Oh, but you do patrol here, Mr. Simpson! Why, I saw you by the creek only this morning, when I was playing pirate!"

Bruce did his best, but that only seemed to confuse Mr. Simpson more. The old man muttered something about how he meant that he couldn't be everywhere all the time, and turned away. The little crowd that had gathered parted to let him by.

"I wonder," said John Emery, watching the old guy move up the bank. "Simpson always was sort of . . . peculiar. I wonder . . ."

But it seemed to Bruce thereafter that wherever he went, the constable was there too, studying him, staring at him.

It happened while Bruce was in the park, watching some mill kids playing ball and wishing that he could dare over-ride his father's veto and join them. As he walked sadly away, Mr. Simpson stepped out from behind a tree.

"I want to talk to you," he hissed, and grasped Bruce's arm roughly, hauling him into the brush.

Lots of times, afterward, Bruce saw how people looked oddly at Mr. Simpson . . . and how oddly Mr. Simpson looked at him.

"Keep away from him," his father warned him. And when Bruce asked why, he added: "Never mind why! Folks in this town are beginning to get some mighty queer ideas about old Simpson. You just stay away from him!"

Bruce twisted and squirmed, fighting free just as Mr. Cooper, the grocer, came up the path.

The grocer was not a particularly brave man, but to him the scene spoke for itself. He saw the tearful boy struggling with the grim-faced snarling old man, and he came at a run, shouting: "Let him go! So it was you! Let him go! MURDERER!"

In moments, there were others, all converging on the startled old man. Mr. Simpson hesitated . . . and then he ran. As the others came, they snatched up pieces of wood, stones. They fanned out, howling. And they hunted him.

But the constable managed to elude them. The men took Bruce home.

"I knew it," said John Emery. "My boy gave him away . . . so he wanted to kill him! Like he killed the others! Well, we know who we're after, now!"

Bruce's father was good at organizing, and the townspeople were sheep to be led. Angry sheep, afraid for their young. Mr. Simpson was doomed at that moment. Emery got his gun and the crowd went baying down Main Street toward the old constable's house.

He wasn't there, of course. So the men ransacked the house. In a drawer, carefully wrapped in a stained napkin, they found the head of the Hayes boy, the one whose body had been left by the creek.

John Emery stared at the ghastly trophy for a long time, silently, while the others fidgeted and turned away.

"He doesn't deserve to live," he whispered, finally. Then he swung around. "I'm appointing you all deputies!" he shouted. "I don't know whether I have the right or not, but I'm taking it! We're going to find Simpson, and when we do, he won't do any more murdering!" He looked around belligerently. "Anyone got any other ideas?"

There was no answer. No one would go against John Emery. "All right," he snarled. "Let's go!"

Outside, Bruce was waiting. He still felt sorry for old Mr. Simpson, but this was too good to miss. The excitement of it.

"Go home," his father told him. "Now! Get into the house and stay there! And don't stop on the way!"

Bruce started, but he went only as far as the corner. Other kids were following the men! Why shouldn't he? They made room for him in their ranks when he caught up, but no one spoke to him. He was John Emery's son. Their parents had told them often to keep away from Bruce. Mr. Emery didn't like having Bruce mingle with them, and their fathers weren't anxious to lose their jobs in Emery's mill.

So, among many, Bruce saw it all. The men stopped at the edge of town only long enough to split into small groups. These spaced themselves out, each several hundred yards separated from the next, and began to move slowly forward. There was open ground here, thick with tall summer grass. A man could hide in it, but not from a line of angry men beating every square inch as they advanced.

A mile from town, Simpson stood up from his hiding place. He stood in plain sight, his face streaked with perspiration, and shouted at them. But his words were jumbled at that distance. The line of men, drawn by John Emery, came on. It was Emery himself who picked up the jagged stone and threw it.

"Murderer!" he screamed. "We don't want to hear your meaty-mouthed plans for mercy!"

Simpson turned, his face white with terror, and fled. A hail of stones rained down upon him as he scampered wildly through the tall grass. When Emery remembered his gun, it was too late. Simpson was a bad target. The shot missed.

Only the others hadn't expected gunfire! It sobered them. One by one, they came to a halt. This wasn't a job for honest citizens. Left to themselves, they'd have turned back. Let the State Police find Simpson.

"Cowards!" John Emery stood before them, raging. "You're afraid of him, aren't you? No wonder you're all nobodies! He kills your children! But that isn't enough! He mutilates them! And you hang back! He's an animal, and you hesitate! He doesn't belong in the same world with decent men, and you'd let him go free! You'd eliminate a mad dog, but you'd let a killer like Simpson escape to kill again!"

"C'mon. What are we waiting for?"

"Yeah. Let's go!"

Here and there, a voice took up the chorus. Some, because the fire of Emery's rhetoric had taken hold of them; some, because John Emery was a powerful man, not to be defied. The men moved together, coalesced into a unit. As a unit, they were powerful, without fear.

The mob was a single beast with many bodies and only one brain, then. John Emery's brain. It was he who led them across the fields. It was he who, when they approached the deserted barn standing desolate among the weeds, reasoned that that was where Simpson would hide. It was he who cupped his hand to his mouth after the men had surrounded the barn and shouted into the wind:

"Come out, Simpson. We know you're in there! The barn is surrounded! You can't get away! Come out and take your medicine, you dirty murdering—!"

"No!" The voice from the barn was a strangled sob. "You're all insane! You can't do this! Any man deserves a trial..."

"You've had your trial, Simpson!" Emery's voice was the trumpet of doom. He stood rampant, big and powerful, aware of his authority, aware of his position as the leader. Savoring it. Enjoying it.

"Come out, Simpson! This is your last chance!"

"No!"

Bruce could see his father from the distance where he had come to a halt with the other kids. He could see his father go into a hurried consultation with the others and then see the men walk to the tinder-dry walls of the old barn.

The first puff of savage flame told Bruce what was happening. It was like the Fourth of July at the Fair Grounds. First, a single bit of brightness. Then others, spreading, mingling, until the barn was a giant torch, with the men dancing around it like Indians, drunk with what they had done.

Bruce felt sick. Mr. Simpson had been inside the barn. Only there was no barn now. There was just a pile of charred, smoking, black ruins, and the men were walking away from it, one by one. The reaction had already set in and the horror of their act was beginning to take its creeping course through each individual conscience. The town would never be the same after today.

But Bruce did not know that. He felt sick, and then normalcy began to assert itself. His father would be furious if he were not home when he got there. In the world of a nine year old, the immediate is far more important than the past. And Mr. Simpson was already in the past.

Bruce turned and scampered for home.

John Emery was the last to leave. The rest of the mob had slunk away, but he was made of sterner stuff. He was smiling as he crossed the fields, although he was not aware of his smile. He felt satisfied in a way that he did not attempt to classify. Power was a wonderful thing, he might have thought ... if he'd bothered to think about his emotion at all.

Susan Emery was seated in silence in the living room when he entered. Word of what had taken place had already spread. But she did not condemn nor condone. Fifteen years of John Emery's overbearing had long since turned her into a pale shadow in the light of his arrogance.

"Well, say it!" He stood before her, waiting.

"Say, what, John?" She did not look up.

"What you're thinking! That we should have let the law take its course! That we had no right to take the law into our own hands!"

"Well, did you have the right, John?" She studied him.

Emery purpled.

"Yes! We did! The man was a monster! I suppose you'd have felt sorry for him!" His voice boomed through the house. "Suppose it was your boy that he murdered! Would you have felt sorry for him then? It had to be done!"

The words were not a defense. They were an explanation.

"Bah! Women!" He turned away. "What's the use of trying to make them understand?"

From above, a thin stream of dust sifted down. Emery looked up at the attic fan.

"Bruce! Are you up in that filthy attic again?"

"Yes, father!" Through the louvers, Bruce could see his father's angry face.

"Get down here! I've told you a hundred times that I don't want you playing up there!"

"Yes, father!"

Carefully, Bruce began to place his treasures back into their hiding place under the loose board.

Poor Mr. Simpson. Father had bullied him, too. Like he bullied everyone. Father had driven everyone away, and had made Mr. Simpson lonely, too.

That was why Bruce had slipped into Mr. Simpson's house that morning and left a treasure for him, carefully wrapped in a napkin.

So that Mr. Simpson would not be lonely anymore.

Bruce was still holding the last of his treasures when his father came into the attic and stopped to stare with the blood draining from his face.

There were four of them in the cavity beneath the loose board. And one in Bruce's hands. Five dead, perpetually smiling heads. Bruce's friends. His real, honest to truly friends who would never leave him, no matter how much his father insisted that they weren't good enough to play with him.

THE END

Reflection of DEATH

Ahead of you, the endless white line that divides the highway stretches off into the blackness beyond the probing yellow fingers of your speeding car's headlight beams. Beside you, Carl sits in silence, puffing on a cigarette, its glowing orange tip reflecting in the windshield. You grip the wheel a little tighter and shiver, as a chill runs up your spine. You wonder idly if it's the cold, or this sudden feeling that has come over you. This sudden premonition of impending doom.

"Getting pretty cold, isn't it, Carl?" you say finally, your voice invading your fearful thoughts and driving them back into the dark.

"Yeah," Carl mutters. "Lucky thing we wore warm clothes with the heater on the fritz . . ."

You and Carl have been riding since daybreak. In another hour, you'll be home. You're tired now. The strain of driving throughout the long day and into the night is beginning to have its effect. Your eyelids are heavy. They keep closing. You shiver again and take your foot off the accelerator.

"You'd better take over for this last stretch, Carl," you say, applying the brakes. "I'd hate to fall asleep at the wheel."

"Sure, Mel," Carl smiles.

You pull off the road, and stop the car. Carl gets out, and an icy blast lashes at your face. You slide across the seat as Carl moves around the car and slips in behind the wheel.

"Why don't you take a little snooze, Mel?" Carl says as he guides the car back out onto the highway. "I'll wake you up when we get to town."

"Maybe I will, Carl," you answer. "I'll see . . ."

You draw your overcoat up around your neck, pull your hat down, reach into your pocket for your gloves, and slip them on. The feeling is back again now, gnawing at you, chafing you in spite of your protective clothing.

You stare out through the windshield. The road comes out of the darkness ahead of you and slides beneath the car . . . faster and faster . . . unending. Carl begins to whistle an off-key tune. The motor purrs. The tires hum. The road comes on. On . . . and on . . . and on . . .

Your head begins to nod. Carl's whistling continues. Flat. Unmelodic. Suddenly he gasps. You look up.

A pair of headlights . . . bright . . . blinding . . . hurtles at you from out of the blackness. You try to scream, but it chokes in your throat, a rattling cough.

"Look out, Mel," Carl shouts. "We're going to hit . . ."

You shut your eyes and hear the shrieking of brakes . . . the sudden thundering splintering crash of tons of metal and glass.

You feel yourself fly forward. There is a blasting light . . . a sudden shooting pain . . . a rush of cold air . . . and then the velvet-black night closes in. All is silent, save for a distant, far-away whimpering.

The blackness is empty . . . bottomless . . . eternal. You float in it . . . twisting . . . falling . . . then rising again. The pain is gone. The cold is gone. Everything is gone. Only the darkness remains. The infinite velvet blackness. Empty. Bottomless. Eternal.

You open your eyes. Tiny pinpoints of light puncture the blackness before you. A leaf flutters lazily, dry and brown, gliding at you. Beyond, skeleton fingers clinging to more brown leaves wave before you. And then you realize that you are on your back, gazing up at the winter-bared trees and the cold star-speckled night sky.

You raise your head slowly and look about. You are lying at the edge of a road. You try to remember. And then it comes back to you. The memory of those blinding headlights. The screaming shattering crash. A collision. You've been in an awful collision and you've been thrown clear. But the wreck! The aftermath! The mass of twisted steel and splintered glass! Where is it?

You struggle to your feet. Your clothes are torn and dirty. And there's an odor . . . a sickening smell that you can't place. You stumble out to the road . . . look up and down. You look for the wreck.

But there's no sign of it. No smashed glass. No impact-distorted metal. Nothing! Just the road. The clean, white concrete road, reaching into the moon-lit night.

You turn as a distant hum grows louder. A car is coming. You can see the headlights, like far-away cat's eyes in the night, growing larger. You stand there, in the center of the highway lane, as the car bears down upon you. You raise your gloved hand. Its wailing brakes bring the car to a screeching stop. You can hear the driver's angry shout:

"Crazy damn fool! Do you want to get yourself killed?"

You step to the window, close to him. You start to ask him if he'll be good enough to drive you to town . . . that there has been a wreck and . . .

But then you see the sudden wild look in his eyes. A look of stark terror. You back off a little, confused, as he stares at you and shrieks . . . and shrieks . . .

You watch as the car meshes gears and careens away. You listen as his screaming fades into the night. You do not understand. Then you laugh to yourself. Of course! You must have been out in the accident! Perhaps the sight of blood startled him. You shrug and start down the road. Toward town. Toward home.

And then you see the fire. There's someone under the conduit bridge, cooking. You can smell the savory odor over the sickening stench that seems to surround you. You move toward him. Down the road embankment. Perhaps he heard the crash. Perhaps he saw the accident. As you approach, you see that it is a hobo . . . a tramp huddled by the fire. He stirs something in a can hung over the flames. He looks up as you approach.

"Welcome, stranger," he smiles. "If you're hungry, set yourself down. The stew's just about done . . ."

You move into the firelight. The tramp looks into the can and sniffs, stirring its contents.

"There's nothing like a hot can of stew on a cold night like . . ." He turns toward you, and suddenly the blood drains from his unshaven face. He cringes back against the stone wall.

"Oh, Lord," he gasps. "No. No! Keep away . . ."

He stumbles to his feet and begins to run, clawing his way up the embankment, shrieking down the road. You watch him as he vanishes into the night.

What's happened to you? Why do people cringe at the sight of you . . . shriek and drive away . . . run screaming into the night? What do you look like? What has the accident done to you?

You look down . . . at the crumpled sheets of newspaper the tramp had been sitting on. You read the date, and you do not understand. "February 26, 1956!" Impossible! It cannot be! That's almost two months from now! Today . . . today is January 1st! The morning of the 2nd, at the most!

You and Carl had been returning from Chicago . . . from a New Year's party. A wild New Year's party. You'd been driving all day. New Year's day. Now, it is New Year's night. Or the next morning. No more. It has to be! How long could you have been unconscious? Almost two months? That's impossible! Or is it?

You climb the embankment and continue on toward town. And then you see another car coming. And this time, as you step into its headlight glare and signal for it to stop, you're determined. You must get help. You must!

The car whines to a stop. There's a woman at the wheel. She's frightened. Well, what woman wouldn't be? A lonely highway, late at night. A strange man . . . stepping out in front of her car . . . forcing her to stop or hit him. Of course she's frightened. She stares wide-eyed into the darkness, trying to see you.

"W-what is it?" she stammers. "W-what do you want?"

You step forward. You are about to tell her not to be afraid . . . that there's been an accident . . . that you mean no harm. But there isn't the time. She takes one look at you . . . her eyes roll . . . she utters a gurgling groan . . . and then she faints.

You open the car door . . .

You slide in beside her and drive the car to the outskirts of town. You leave it there, on a side-street, the woman unconscious on the front seat. Then, you make your way home.

When you reach your house, you stop, dumbfounded. The lawn is litter-strewn and overgrown. Old newspapers whisper across the walk. The doors and windows are boarded up. The house stands silent and empty and deserted, like a tomb.

A lone figure approaches. You run to him. Is it possible? Have you really been unconscious for nearly two months?

"What day is this?" you cry as you near him. "What's today's date? I must know . . ."

And then you see his face . . .

There is a sign tacked to the boarded-up door. You move closer . . . read it: "No Trespassing," the bold black letters scream at you, "by order of the sheriff. This property has been foreclosed by the People's Bank and Trust Co., January 15, 1956, to be sold at auction on . . ."

You turn away as distant footsteps echo up the deserted street. Someone is coming.

He runs from you, wildly, shouting for help, stumbling, falling, getting up, running again. And you run after him. You only want to ask him a question. Why does he run? Why does everybody run from you? What is there about you that makes people scream and faint at the sight of you?

Carl's house! You're standing in front of Carl's house, and the screaming stranger is gone!

Carl will help you! Carl, who was with you when the accident occurred! He'll know! He'll be able to tell you what happened!

You climb the steps and ring the doorbell . . . again and again.

Heavy footsteps approach from within. The door opens. Carl stares out at you. You wait for him to scream . . . wait for that sudden look of horror . . . wait for him to run from you.

But nothing happens. He only stands there, staring at you. "Carl," you cry. "Let me come in. You've got to help me. I don't know what's happened to me. Please . . ."

"Who . . . who are you?" Carl demands.

"It's me, Carl," you say. "Mel! It's me . . ."

You push past him into the darkened house. You tell him the whole story. You blurt it out. Everything. The crash . . . how you came to . . . how people screamed and ran from you when they saw you.

"All except you, Carl," you whisper. "You did not scream! You did not run from me! You, Carl! My friend . . ."

"You joke with me!" Carl snaps. "Whoever you are, don't joke with me!"

He stares at you blankly in the darkness.

"Don't you know me, Carl?" you shout. "Don't you recognize your old friend Mel?"

Carl shakes his head and reaches for the light switch. "Don't you know that Mel and I were in an accident two months ago?" he hisses. "Don't you know that I couldn't recognize anybody?"

He snaps on the light and you see his face . . . his eyes!

"Don't you know that I lost my sight in that accident? That I'm totally blind?"

"And don't you know that Mel died in that accident?" Carl goes on. "That he was horribly mangled! So how can you be Mel, when Mel's dead? That's why I say, don't joke with me . . ."

You reel in disbelief at Carl's words. You shake your head and gasp.

"No, Carl! I am Mel! I am! I can't be dead! I . . . I . . ."

You look around you wildly. You see the mirror. You stagger towards it . . . and you look in.

And then you scream. You open your rosted, torn, decomposed mouth at the sight of your awful reflection in the mirror and you scream . . .

And suddenly, Carl is beside you . . . shaking you . . . shaking . . . shaking . . .

"Mel, Mel! Mel . . ."

Your scream of horror vanishes, the hum of a car engine comes up, and Carl's voice probes down into the darkness.

"Mel! Mel, wake up!" Carl is saying.

"Huh? Wha . . . ?" You open your eyes.

"You've been having a nightmare, Mel!"

You look around. You're in the car, and Carl is driving. You've been dreaming . . . dreaming the whole horrible experience!

"Thank God," you whisper. "Thank God!"

"For what, Mel?" Carl asks.

"Thank God it was only a nightmare, Carl!" You cover your eyes with your gloved hand. "It was awful. Awful! I dreamed I was dead! Everything . . . everything was so real! So real!"

"Oh. Yeah. Sure," Carl mutters. He begins to whistle an off-key tune.

You sit back and watch the road as it unfolds beyond the headlight glow and rushes toward you and under the car. You think about your nightmare, and you wonder whether you should tell Carl about what you dreamed.

"We'll be home soon, Mel," Carl says, and goes back to his flat, unmelodic whistling.

You stare out of the windshield. Far away, a pair of headlights knife through the darkness. They come down the white highway . . . bright . . . blinding . . . closer and closer.

And suddenly, icy fingers are gripping your hammering heart. Suddenly, stark terror claws at the back of your neck. Those headlights. Coming at you. Faster. Faster. Like . . .

Like in the dream!

"Carl," you whisper hoarsely. "We . . . we . . . That car!"

Your scream of warning chokes in your throat, a rattling cough.

"Look out, Mel," Carl shouts. "We're going to hit!"
The dream! So much like the dream!

You shut your eyes and hear the shrieking of brakes . . . the sudden thundering splintering crash of tons of metal and glass.

You feel yourself fly forward. There is a blinding light . . . a sudden shooting pain . . . a rush of cold air . . . and then the velvet-black night closes in and you are floating in a sea of darkness . . . twisting . . . falling . . . then rising again . . .

You open your eyes. You can see the pinpoint stars above you, twinkling. A leaf shudders, then tears itself away from the skeleton tree overhead and floats lazily down toward you. You know that you are on your back, lying at the side of the road. You know, because the scene is the same . . . the same as in your awful awful dream.

You raise your head and look down at your feet, at the road. And you know that you will see no smashed glass, no twisted metal. Because this is the dream! The dream come to reality!

You struggle to your feet. Your clothes are torn and dirty, and there is a sickening odor. You know what that odor is. You know, now! The sound of an engine tells you of the approach of a car. You step out onto the highway . . .

The car screeches to a stop, its tires tracing black lines on the white moon-lit concrete. You wait for the driver's angry shout, just as you dreamed it. And, just as in your dream, it comes:

"Crazy damn fool! Do you want to get yourself killed?"

The dream is real! You know what's about to happen! You step to the window, close to him, and you steel yourself for his reaction.

And it comes. A haunting, terrified scream.

And you know, now, that you are dead, and that this time, there will be no awakening! That this time, it is no dream!

THE END

Olympic

all 3 for the price of TV alone

TELEVISION

PHONOGRAPH

HI-FI RADIO

YES, A BONUS OF 3 FROM OLYMPIC TV

Look! Your choice of 17", 21" or 24" TV—
PLUS hi-fi radio—PLUS 3 speed automatic hi-fi phonograph... all in one magnificent unit... all for virtually the same money as ordinary TV sets alone! So why settle for only TV, when now you can own this beautiful 3-way combination at such a low price! See it at your dealer's today.

HI-FI AM/FM Radio-
Phonograph

From $149.95*

- 17"—21"—24" Models
- Single speaker or dual speaker HI-FI sound systems
- DECORATOR STYLES • modern • traditional • chinese
- AM or AM/FM RADIO

*Slightly higher in South and West

46 handsome combination models to fit every home interior!

Send for free literature

Olympic

RADIO AND TELEVISION INC.

34-68 38th Avenue
Long Island City 1, N. Y.

OLYMPIC RADIO & TELEVISION, INC.
34-68 38th Avenue, Long Island City 1, N. Y.

- ☐ Send me free literature on Olympic 3-Way combinations and hi-fi.
- ☐ Send me name of nearest Olympic dealer.

Name: _____

Address: _____

City: _____ Zone: _____ State: _____

Continuity Publishing

NEXT...

©1998 Neal Adams

CIMMERIAN 32. SCANNED & EDITED